THE PORTER OF SEVILLE.

The Porter sate at the Convent gate,
And a stalwart youth was he :
His shoulders were broad and his limbs were straight,
And he bounded beneath the heaviest weight
With a lightsome step and free.

And gay was the glance of his sparkling e'en,
And merry the Porter's song,
And his glossy black hair like the raven's sheen Hung down on his collar of velvet green
In clusters rich and long.

And now he sate down by the Convent wall
Reclined on a bench of stone,
And smoked his cigar in the twilight's fall,
And murmured his thanks to the good St. Paul
That his daily work was done.

But why hath he started from off his seat,
And why doth he gaze and peer
At the casement barred that o'erhangs the street,
And what are those accents low and sweet
That have reached the Porter's ear ?

“Gentle Spaniard would'st thou do
A deed of charity,
And save from perilous scathe and woe
The maid that appeals to thee;
The wicket behind thee stands ajar,
And the winding stair will lead
By the silent light of the evening star
To the cell where I bid thee speed.”

Cold ran the Porter's blood I ween,
When she spake of a deed to be done,
But fair was the face that his eyes had seen,
And sweet and soft had the accents been
That were breathed by the dark-eyed nun.

And soon he banished his doubts and fears,
Though stern the monastic rule;
For the heart that relents not at woman's tears,
And turns with disdain from a woman's prayers
Is the heart of a craver fool.

Ah Porter! bethink thee what ills are wrought
By the glance of a bright black eye;
But the snare is laid and the bird is caught,
And reason and prudence are set at naught
When the pulse of life beats high.

So he turned him through the wicket anon,
And he mounted the winding stair;
Till he reached the cell where the dark-eyed nun
Stood like an image of breathing stone
So stately so pale and fair.

Haughty her glance and stern her air,
And her eyes gleamed wild and bright,
And flashed through the braids of her coal black hair,
As flashes the beam of the planet star
Through the deepening gloom of night.

She raised a lamp from behind the door,
And flung the taper's ray
Where a sackcloth robe on the chamber floor
All draggled and rent and stained with gore
Like a funeral garment lay.

And propt against the pallet bed
He beheld! oh sight unblest,
The corpse of a monk but newly dead,
With a dagger's blade all reeking red
In the murdered victim's breast.

"Away with that carrion," fierce she cried,
"Go bear thy burthen straight
Through the cypress grove and the garden wide
That encircle the convent's eastern side,
To the unlatched postern gate.

"And cast him down from the rampart wall,
To the depths of the still green pool
Where the toad and the serpent croak and crawl,
And the wild dogs troop at the twilight's fall
Their frothing jaws to cool.

"Yet hold that thy spirit may bear thee up
Through the bold and dismal task,
Here drain to its last and spiciest drop
This rich draught mantling in the cup
From Oviedo's cask."

Trembling he drank, and he felt each vein
Throb high with the kindling heat,
That thrilled almost with a thrill of pain
Through each tingling nerve from his dizzy brain
Adown to his very feet.

He bowed at the knees of that lady bright,
And madly 'gan to pray
That she his love with her footstep light
Should follow him on in his daring flight
To some region far away.

To those fabled isles of bliss that lie
Beyond the Atlantic waves,
Where the feathered palm trees brush the sky,
And aromatic breezes sigh
Through ocean's pearly caves.

"Be hushed" she cried "submit to fate,
Pronounced is fate's decree :
First do thine errand bold youth and wait
For wait thou wilt beside the gate,
Leave leave the rest to me."

Some words he stammered he scarce knew what,
And to his lips he bare
Her small white hand which seas could not Cleanse from the stain of one crimson spot,
That had left its token there.

Away from that cell the porter hied,
And bore his burthen straight
Through the cypress grove and the garden wide
That encircled the Convent's eastern side,
To the unlatched northern gate.

And down he hurled the lifeless mass
Sheer from the rampart's height,
Where waves the rank and sedgy grass
Along the edge of the dull morass
In the witchfire's wandering light.

Now Porter lay thee down and sleep !
Thence shalt thou rouse thee never—
For the poisoned cup hath begun to steep
Both sense and soul in the slumber deep
That shall seal thine eyes for ever.

THE DIVER.

(FROM THE GERMAN.)

“Is there a knight or squire so bold
 To plunge into the dark abyss,
 And dare to snatch this cup of gold
 Forth from its breakers fathomless ?
 Whosoe’er may fetch it up
 Let him keep the golden cup.”

The monarch tossed the glittering prize
 From the rock whereon he stood ;
 And followed it with yearning eyes
 Into Charybdis’ howling flood :
 “Who has the heart, I ask once more,
 To plunge into the whirlpool’s roar ?”

But the knights and squires around
 Hear his voice and hold their breath,
 And gaze upon the gulf profound
 Yawning like the gate of death.
 When the monarch asks again,
 “Will not one of all my train Explore the secrets of the main ?”

Still never a word spoke squire nor lord ;
 But a page at the king’s behest
 Stept out from among the trembling throng
 And loosened his broidered vest :
 Whilst all who the desperate purpose saw,
 Stared on the reckless youth with awe.

Calm on the brink he stood and steady,
Gazing on the tortured waves
Which erst the Charybdean eddy
Had whirled within her oozy caves,
And now upon the echoing shore
Regurgitates with hideous roar.

And the briny ocean bubbles and hisses
Like water when cast on fire,
And gushes and spouts from the deep abysses
In columns flung higher and higher,
And all unexhausted the cauldron seems
Pouring forth a succession of boiling streams.

Lulled at length is the wrath and trouble,
When a strange and fearful well
Yawns in the midst of the froth and bubble
Like the fathomless pit of hell :
And again the waves with eddying spasm
Are sucked into the whirlpool's chasm.

And the youth before their returning roar,
Hath commended his soul to heaven—
Bursts a wild cry from the standers by
To behold him downwards driven,
And over the swimmer fair and brave
Entombed in the mysterious wave
Are closed the jaws of a watery grave.

Stilled was the pool, not a ripple stirred,
But beneath the surface smooth
The murmur of pent up strife was heard,
And from lip to lip passed the doleful word
Farewell stout-hearted youth !
Still grumbled and growled the sullen sea
And the pulse of each heart beat painfully.

Men felt that e'en though the crown lay there
And he who from the deep
Should bring it, might the bauble wear—
There let it ever sleep !
Kingdom nor crown could ne'er redeem
One victim from Charybdis' stream.

Full many a gallant bark hath sent
When the merciless whirl had caught her,
Her shivered keel and her timbers rent
Back from that boiling water.
Which now like the hurricane's wild commotion
Belches in wrath from the roaring ocean.

And again it bubbles and foams and hisses
Like water when cast on fire,
And gushes and spouts from the dark abysses
In columns flung higher and higher,
And again the tortured sea's vibration
Shakes the rude rocks' deep foundation.

But lo from the torrent submarine
A snowy gleam emerges,
And an arm and a fair white throat are seen,
And feebly the swimmer floats between The channel's eddying surges ;
'Tis he with his left hand holding up
In token of triumph the golden cup.

His bosom heaved long with convulsion strong,
When he greeted the light of day,
And a shout burst forth from the joyful throng
He lives he returns, hurrah !
The brave the beautiful hath risen
Unharm'd, unchanged from his briny prison.

He clings to the rock and his happy friends
Upraise him from the water,
And low on his knees the diver bends
And the golden cup to the king extends—
Who beckons his lovely daughter,
And she filled it up with the sparkling wine,
And encouraged the youth with her voice and sign
To tell the terrors of the brine.

“ Oh sire let all be content whose breath
Is drawn from the gladsome air,
In the waters beneath there is gloom and death,
Let mortal man beware
And never again desire to see
What heaven hath wrapt in mystery.

It bore me down like the lightning's flash,
And lo from a rocky cleft
A tearing stream did against me dash,
And that double shock bereft
All power of motion and drove me round,
In the giddy whirl benumbed and drowned.

But God to whose holy name I prayed
In that moment of awful need,
Shewed me a reef upon which I stayed
My sinking strength, and I clung for aid
To the stems of the coral weed.
And the golden cup in its branches hung
By the force of the eddying currents flung.

Huge rocks and gulfs beneath me roll'd
Immersed in purple gloom,
And my eyes looked down with shuddering cold
Mid a silence like the tomb,
On the reptiles and fish and Polypi,
That swam in the currents whirling by.

The water was black with hideous clusters
Of jelly-fish crab and worm,
The prickly urchins the star-like asters,
And the sword-fish's dreadful form,
And the prowling shark, the wolf of the sea
Glared with his glaucous eyes on me.

And there I hung on the coral scaur,
My every pulse subdued,
From sympathy and succour far
In the dismal solitude :
The only feeling heart among
The trackless ocean's scaly throng.

When rapid as thought the shark drew near Self-poised in the whirling current,
And oped his dread jaws, in the madness of fear
I let go the grasp that retained me there
And abandoned myself to the torrent,
Whose stream irresistible bore me up
Unwounded though breathless again to the top."

With wondering mind replied the king,
"This goblet youth is thine—
And to the cup I'll add a ring
Adorned with jewels fine,
If thou wilt venture once again
To the deeper chambers of the main."

But then outspoke that lady fair,
With coaxing voice she pleads,
"Oh father tempt him not to dare
Again such desperate deeds—
Say hath not the modest page's fame
Put knight and squire alike to shame !"

Thereat the monarch seized the cup
And flung it in the water,
“ Now if once more thou fetch it up
Behold my peerless daughter,
Who pleads for thy sake at her father’s side
Shall embrace thee to-night as thy gentle bride.”

Oh then was the power of love displayed,
And fire from the youth’s eye flashes
As he sees the lovely the weeping maid
Turn faint and paler than ashes,
It goads him to madness the prize to win,
And for life or for death he plunges in.

The eddies whirl round with a sullen sound,
And are spouted again to the shore,
And hither and thither the waves dash together,
But the youth he returns no more—
Only a blood-red stain is seen
Streaking the course of the waters green.

THE OLD HUNTING SCHLOSS.

(FROM THE GERMAN.)

The guests were all to the forest gone
 To hunt the deer with hound and horn,
 In the ancient Schloss I sat alone
 Awaiting dreamily their return.
 Th' autumnal sunset's pale red beam
 Streamed through the narrow casement barred,
 And all as still as death did seem
 Save the trees that sighed in the Castle yard.

The frames antique of tarnished gold,
 The chimney's stone carved foliage,
 The dark and faded tapestry's fold,
 Seemed remnants of a former age :
 The quaint old clock began its chime,
 An ancient love tune was the strain,
 And I dreamed of those who in olden time
 Had heard that tune with mirth or pain.

The portraits seemed to leave their frames,
 And throng with shadowy forms the floor,
 And steel clad knights and stately dames
 Swam through the vaulted corridor :
 I saw the silks the gold brocade,
 The ample hoop the jewelled band,
 When on my shoulder there was laid
 The pressure of an icy hand.

I turned and there, so help me God,
A lady stood with features pale,
And hands like a sepulchral clod,
In mourning robe and sable veil;
She looked, but oh that piteous look !
That glazed and half extinguished eye !
Seemed as though this world I forsook
And glanced into eternity.

She beckoned me—no step I heard
No rustling train that swept the floor,
She gave no greeting spoke no word,
But open flew each chamber door
As on she went, I followed dumb
Through state apartments chill and lone :
By staircase, passage, tapestried room,
And vaulted arch and walls of stone.

She turned and entered a deep recess,
On a slab in a gloomy chamber there
Lay a gold embroidered etui case,
By a curtained bed with hangings fair.
With her corpse-like hand she seemed to point
To the table first and then the floor,
I reeled and shuddered in every joint,
To see on the planks a blot of gore.

When I rose the phantom appeared not,
She had melted like mist into empty air :
I stood transfixed to the fatal spot,
With leaden foot and with bristling hair :
My heart was ice my head swam round,
When the hunter's chorus echoing loud,
And the bugle's call and the baying hound
Aroused me, and trembling I joined the crowd.

THE STEWARD'S TALE.

The night was dark—in the chimney nook
 The steward and I we sat together,
 While the fitful blast the turret shook,
 And the owls shrieked shrill in the gusty weather :
 And while in owning the vision dread
 I gave my burthened soul relief,
 “ You have seen her then,” he only said,
 And thus he told the tale of grief.

“ She was a rich and haughty dame,
 In childhood mated to one unloved,
 Austere and jealous of her fane,
 Howe’er by pride or passion moved ;
 Her eye the menial crew restrained,
 Few could its angry glance withstand,
 She never sang nor laughed, but reined
 Her hunting steed with a manly hand.

Her daughter was of a different mood,
 An only child of gentle mind,
 Like a lovely rose in its native wood
 That flings its fragrance to the wind :
 Her hair waved gold in the breezes wild,
 Her deep blue eyes like violets were,
 My grandsire saw her when a child,
 And could not name her without a tear.

A youth to the Castle came—ere long
A change in that fair young girl was wrought,
Her pleasure was now to hear his song,
And read the riddle of his thought ;
She loved in silence, but when the spring
Brought back the flowers and woke the grove,
It touched her young heart's awakening,
She loved and fell, who is safe from love !

Dumb was the mother's wrath, but deep,
The daughter wept the youth implored,
In vain they kneel, in vain they weep,
He fled and perished by the sword.
But when the purple vintage glowed,
Athwart that tower was drawn a veil ;
And there the young life's current flowed,
Like a frozen stream in a sunless dale.

One night the trembling menials spoke
Of stealthy steps and whisperings nigh,
Then stifled groans the silence broke,
And then an infant's wailing cry ;
Then all was silent—through that door
The countess stept all deathly pale,
You saw the bodkin, ask no more,
That fatal blood spot tells the tale.

The young heart broke—with wonted pride
The funeral pomp they celebrate ;
The silver lamps burnt on either side,
And the mourners were ranged in solemn state :
Like a statue of stone her mother came,
And laid without ever a sob or tear,
With unfaltering hand, but with eyes of flame,
The virgin wreath on her daughter's bier.

Before a twelvemonth past, once more
The funeral pageant forth was led ;
The countess to her grave they bore,
But rest she found not with the dead.
For when in autumn's pale twilight
Is heard the sound of vesper chime,
That bloody spot calls forth her sprite,
To haunt the scene that saw her crime."

He paused—I durst not quit the place,
Nor turn my eyes from the blazing coal,
For fear of that chill ghastly face,
That look which froze the inmost soul :
The driving rain on the casement pane
Beat, as the tempest sank and rose,
I seized my light—" Old man good night !
Let us pray for the guilty soul's repose."

THE SPECTRE BRIDEGROOM.

(FROM THE GERMAN.)

Night glooms upon the Rhine, and dark
 The solemn stream rolls by,
 While on his wave a little bark
 Is floating listlessly.

Within an armed cavalier
 Looks vacantly around,
 There's a stain of blood on his golden hair,
 As from a recent wound.

Quoth he, "Behold your fortress old
 That frowns upon the Rhine,
 The ladye faire that castle's heir
 This night shall she be mine.

Her promise she hath pledged to me,
 Hath plighted me her vow,
 What if she broke the words she spoke—
 All all is over now."

With bitter scorn like one forlorn,
 And void of hope spake he;
 And if the while he seemed to smile,
 That smile was drear to see.

And now each guest to the marriage feast
Within that ancient hall
Is welcomed there, but the ladye fair
Sits lonely on the wall.

Not a skiff or boat remains afloat,
While the dance is never stayed—
But the pensive bride hath escaped aside
To the garden's tranquil shade.

And while the song in chorus rung,
She dreamed of days gone by,
And wept to hear the bridal cheer
That chimed so merrily.

Then the gay bridegroom, as he doffed his plume,
Stept up in the silent night,
And spoke so kind to her troubled mind
That again her heart was light.

“Why weep ye by the tide ladye—
Why weep when all are gay?
When the stars shine bright in the blue midnight,
And the rushing waters play.

With the bridal wreath in your tresses dark
You look like a nymph divine,
Come sail with me in the little bark
Upon the rippling Rhine.”

She followed him down to the little boat,
And sate her in the bow—
And quickly the knight set the skiff afloat,
As he let the moorings go.

“ Ah me the sounds of the song and dance
On the wings of the wind are gone,
No more in the stream do the windows gleam
So swiftly the boat sails on :

What mountain range so wild and strange
Stretches onward wide and far,
What sudden thrill doth my bosom chill
As we pass yon rugged scaur !

And forms unknown on its crest of stone
Look down on our bounding skiff,
And throng the height in the dim moonlight,
All ghastly and pale and stiff.”

But still in the gloom sate the dull bridegroom,
And never a token gave,
As he steered the bark through the waters dark,
And gazed on the sullen wave.

Again she spake—“ See the morning break
Through the red and lurid cloud—
Wild sounds I hear in the misty air,
And the cocks are crowing loud.

Why sits my love so pale ! and why
Doth the red blood soil thy hair—
Oh for mercy now no bridegroom thou !”
But a phantom knight is there.

Then he rose from his seat, and the storm that beat
On the surging wave and wood,
Is stilled at his glance o’er the wide expanse
Of forest and field and flood.

And a strange delight mixed with wild affright
Through her heart and her fancy strayed,
As she gazed at him in feature and limb
Her earliest love portrayed.

He called her his own, in his arms of stone
He encircled her fainting form,
And his bride he prest to his icy breast,
Then vanished away in the storm.

The sun rose high in the Eastern sky
Amid vapours of bloody red,
In a drifting boat, that was seen afloat,
The ladye fair lay dead.

THE KING AND THE ABBOT.

(FROM THE GERMAN.)

I'll tell you a story as droll as may be,
 There once lived a king and a stern king was he,
 And there once was an abbot, a prouder lived never,
 But his shepherd though humble was ten times as clever.

Austere was the monarch the whole twelvemonth round,
 Oftimes in his armour he slept on the ground,
 And often he dined on coarse bread and black broth,
 And often was famished for want of them both.

But the abbot he took of himself better care,
 Very sound were his slumbers and dainty his fare,
 His round visage glowed with good feeding and mirth,
 And two men could hardly encompass his girth.

The Sovereign's visits were sudden and rare,
 But one day when the Abbot was taking the air,
 At the head of a soldierly train he rode by,
 With the sun blazing bright in a hot summer sky.

"Ob—ho!" cries the monarch, "Sir Abbot good speed!"
 And he smiled a grim smile as he reined in his steed;
 "How goes it Sir Prelate! methinks pretty fair—
 You don't lose your flesh with your fasting and prayer.

"But you sure must be plagued with abundance of leisure,
 And a little more work will be so much more pleasure;
 For they say you're a man of such marvellous learning,
 That the grass while it grows can't escape your discerning.

“So now I will give your oracular jaws
Three hard nuts to crack without much time to pause ;
In the space of three months you must finish the task,
And when that time is over three questions I’ll ask.

“And first when I sit on th’ imperial throne,
With my jewels and royal habiliments on,
Súrrounded by all that is gorgeous on earth,
You must tell me how much to a farthing I’m worth.

“And next I require that this secret be found—
How long it would take me to ride the world round :
The time for this feat to a minute you’ll say,
For I know that such riddles to you must be play.

“And thirdly Sir Prelate, you’ll guess and declare
The thoughts of my mind to the breadth of an hair ;
Thus I fairly shall prove thee, but only in sooth
These thoughts must be void of one tittle of truth.

“And if these three problems you fail to divine,
No longer shall you be an abbot of mine ;
But a jackass shall carry you over the land,
With instead of a bridle, his tail in your hand.”

Then off rode the monarch with gibe and with sneer,
But the priest tore his hair with vexation and fear ;
No criminal ever looked more woe begone
When his trial was past and his sentence came on.

He sent to th’ academy, sent to the college,
Made all the philosophers rub up their knowledge,
Bribed all the professors, but lost his digestion,
For never a doctor could answer one question.

As the abbot meanwhile for interpreters seeks,
The hours grow to days and the days grow to weeks,
And the weeks grow to months, till the last day draws nigh—
And pale dawns the morn to the priest's jaundiced eye.

Poor soul ! with sunk eyes and with wan haggard face
He sought in the forest the loneliest place :
And there on a pathway all rugged with rock,
Hans Bendich the shepherd was feeding his flock.

"My lord abbot," quoth he, "you're sore shrunken and haggart
You're wasted just like the burnt end of a faggot—
Holy Virgin and saints ! what's befallen our master,
By my certie you've suffered some grievous disaster."

"Oh my worthy Hans Bendich ! you rightly have guessed,
'Tis the king that has banished all peace from my breast,
And has fixed in my teeth three such hard nuts to break,
As Satan himself could not manage to crack.

"The first is, that when on th' imperial throne
He sits with his royal habiliments on,
Surrounded by all that is gorgeous on earth,
I'm to say to a farthing how much he is worth.

"And next he demands that the secret be found
How long it would take him to ride the world round ;
To a minute the time I'm expected to say,
For he swears that such riddles to me must be play.

"And thirdly I'm doomed, wretched man, to declare
The thoughts of his mind to the breadth of an hair,
Then he truly shall judge me, but only forsooth,
These thoughts must be void of one tittle of truth.

And if I can't answer these hard questions three,
He vows that no longer an abbot I'll be :
But a jackass shall carry me over the land,
With instead of a bridle, his tail in my hand.

"Sir is that all" Hans Bendich with laughing replied—
"Take comfort, I'll soon the right answers provide Your cap and your robes and your cross let me borrow,
Never fear—you shall still be an abbot to-morrow.

"For though I'm not able in Latin to jabber,
I can peep through a millstone as well as my neighbour—
And some things you wiseacres can't have for money
I sucked in with her milk from my mother like honey."

The abbot he leaped like a kid with delight—
And soon was Hans Bendich so richly bedight
With mitre and mantle, and crozier and ring,
Then boldly he went to the court of the king.

And there on his throne the proud sovereign sate
With his sceptre and crown, and his jewels of state ;
"Now tell me" Sir Abbot "and mind tell me true
How much I am worth as I'm valued by you."

"For thirty broad pieces our Lord was betrayed,
And now as your majesty will be obeyed,
Since the price of His blood must be greater than thine,
Your value I rate at just twenty-and-nine."

"Ahem" said the monarch "there's something in that
To humble our grandeur and lessen our state :
But by my good sword and my honour I vow,
I never esteemed myself dog cheap till now.

"But have you an answer to question the second?
The time for a ride round the world have you reckoned?
Not a minute too much or too little you'll say
For I'm sure that such riddles to you must be play."

"Sir King—if you'll get up and ride with the sun,
And follow his car till his circuit be run,
I'll wager my cross and episcopal robe,
That in twenty-four hours you will ride round the globe."

Ha—ha! laughed the king, "you can jest in your need,
With ifs and with buts you have foraged the steed,
When a man of his ifs and his buts has good plenty,
He may plenish his pockets with coin when they are empty."

"But now for the third, good Sir Priest, or alas
I fear you may yet have your ride on the ass—
What think I that's false—answer quickly, and mind
That you leave all your ifs and perhaps's behind."

"Your Majesty thinks I'm the Prior of St. Ruth"—
"Yes and certainly that can't be far from the truth."
Your pardon dread sire you're too little observant,
My Lord Abbot's at home I'm Hans Bendich his servant."

"What not my Lord Abbot"—the monarch replies,
While joy and astonishment beam in his eyes;
Thou not my Lord Abbot the better for thee,
For the Prior of St. Ruth soon Hans Bendich shall be."

"I'll invest thee with mitre and mantle and ring,
But to carry thy master a donkey we'll bring,
So let him endeavour Quid Juris to know,
For they who would reap should first labour to sow."

"Sire grant me your pardon ! 'twould scarcely be better,"
For I can't read or cypher or scribble a letter,
Still less could I manage in Latin to preach,
What the boy hath not learnt, the man never can teach."

"That's a pity my worthy Hans Bendich for me,
Then ask for yourself what the favour shall be—
For I'm vastly content with your excellent wit,
And fain would I grant you the boon you think fit."

"Sir King just at present my wishes are few,
But trusting your majesty's favour is true,
I will ask for myself as an honest reward,
Your forgiveness and grace for my reverend Lord."

"And that you shall have, honest fellow, instead,
For I see that your heart is as good as your head,
The abbot we'll pardon for Hans Bendich's sake,
And you to your master the tidings shall take."

"But we now make it known to that right Lordly Prior,
That Hans Bendich no longer shall serve him for hire,
But a fifth of the abbey's revenues shall keep
For the future in plenty the feeder of sheep."

FATALITY.

“Awake my sire ! the ruddy morn
 Gleams bright o'er earth and sky,
 The dewdrops on the tangled thorn
 Like diamond clusters lie,
 And hark the hunter's echoing horn
 Rings loud and merrily.”

Slow from his couch the Pacha rose,
 And answer made he none,
 But sate and gazed in stern repose
 Upon his princely son :

And there the stalwart stripling stood,
 Equipped in hunting gear,
 Grasping with eager hand the wood
 Of his long hunting spear.

Beneath his close and polished casque
 His raven ringlets twine,
 From his broad baldrick hangs the flask
 That loads his carabine.

Light rings of steel all interlaced
 Protect each sinewy limb,
 The tight-drawn girdle clasps his waist
 Small, flexible, and slim.

Like Meleager there he stood,
 And as Adonis fair,
 When clad in arms they sought the wood
 To rouse the slumbering bear.

"Hark to the bloodhound's stifled bay,
See on the dusty plain
My Juba rears to start away,
And shakes his snowy mane.

The sun is up—beneath his fire
The steaming scent will fade,
Give me thy blessing, Royal Sire !
The chase is still delayed."

"Now rest this day my noble boy !
Come nearer to my heart,
For other thoughts my soul employ
I cannot let thee part.

The sunbeams' fiery stroke may chance
On thy loved head to fall,
I dread the wound of heedless lance
Or erring rifle ball ;

Go seek the shelter of the brake,
Go where thy barge floats near
Among the sedges of the lake
Cool, calm, and crystal clear—

And Leila there her harp shall bring,
And in the cedar grove
At noontide's scorching hour shall sing
The lays of peace and love."

"Ah ! say not so my noble lord !
Such slothful days I scorn ;
I love the clash of lance and sword,
I love the hound and horn :

I love to scour the desert sand,
And drive the beasts of chase
Till brought to bay they panting stand,
O'ertaken in the race.

This very night from Atlas' height
Two mighty lions came,
And prowled around our tented ground,
With glaring eyes of flame;

Two milk-white steers, the herdsman's pride,
Beneath their talons bled :
Revenge ! revenge ! on Atlas' side,
I'll slay them where they fed."

The father's cheek turned ashen hue,
His frame with terror shook,
The clammy sweat like drops of dew
Out on his forehead broke :

And once and twice he strove to speak,
But twice he strove in vain,
Till tears rolled down his furrowed cheek,
And brought his voice again.

" Now sit thee down at my bed-side,
Forgive an old man's fears—
Thou art the only prop and pride
Of my declining years.

I love thee for my lost Gulnare,
For her sake, and thine own,
I love thee as the promised heir
Of Mauritania's throne.

Last night I dreamed a fearful dream,
And thrice it came and went,
And thrice I heard some spirit scream
A wild and shrill lament :

I saw thee by a lion torn,
I saw thy death-stroke given,
Nay Akbar ! frown not so, nor scorn
A vision sent by Heaven."

But then out broke that fiery youth,
"What doating tales are these !
And would'st thou palm on me for truth
Nocturnal phantasies ?

Am I a child, a timid slave,
To tremble when the wind
May shake the lattice bars, or wave
The tapestry behind ?

Where is mine ancient nurse to reach
Her babe a helping hand ?
Or old Mahommed's rod to teach Obedience to command ?"

"Enough," the wrathful Pacha cried,
Upon thy life forbear !
Refrain thine insolence and pride
Thou bold undutecous heir !

"Ho guards !" he clapped his hands—"retire
And leave me to my rest—
I'll teach thee to respect thy sire,
I place thee in arrest."

The mantling flush of shame o'erspread
The stripling's contrite brow,
He kneeled, and humbly on the bed
He laid his sabre low :

And choking with the stifled sob
Of mingled grief and pride,
He meekly kissed his father's robe
Then turned him from his side.

And now behold the youth removed Within his lonely room,
Far from the scenes he dearly loved
Behold him fret and fume :

Till pacing up and down he sees
Upon the wall portrayed,
And shadowed o'er with giant trees
A glorious hunt arrayed.

The god-like Alexander there
Bucephalus bestrode,
And roused the lion from his lair
In Atropatia's wood :

Him followed with a gorgeous train,
Hephæstion and Parmenio brave,
And many a courser scoured the plain,
And many a turbaned slave.

There crouched the forest's lion king
With eyes of sanguine glow,
And bristling mane in act to spring
On his advancing foe.

"Vile brute," the youth exclaims, "no doubt
Thy grisly painted form
Haunted the Pacha's dreams and brought
On my poor head the storm :

Take this for thy reward"—he drove
His fist i' the lion's face
With heedless vehemence, and clove
In twain the mimic chase :

Ah fatal stroke ! a treacherous point
Behind the arras skein,
Transpierced his wrist's unguarded joint
Through artery and vein ;

Burst the warm life-blood from the wound
In torrents on the floor,
And sprinkled all the tapestry round,
With jets of crimson gore.

Vain were the leech's healing cares
To that torn arm applied,
Vain his distracted father's prayers,
He languished, sank and died.

THE CURSE OF BENDONALD.

Sir Hubert sat in the Hunter's chair,
 With a brow of gloom, and a heart of care ;
     And he gazed from its caverned arch
 Upon Coigach's rugged cliffs, and o'er
 The cloudy skirts of the huge Benmore,
 And along the creeks of the wild sea-shore,
 And the chain of lakes, and the mountains hoar,
     To the distant Assynt march.

The Hunter's chair was a natural cell,
 Beneath a crag's high pinnacle,
     With a transverse stone within ;
 And there when the fiercest tempests rave,
 And lash into foam the lake's wild wave—
 The shepherd who fears such storm to brave,
 May rest for a while in the lonely cave,
     And sit with a warm dry skin.

And here when the summer sunset's ray
 Poured a golden light on the rocky brae,
     And gleamed on the purple heath ;
 Oft have Bendonald's Chieftains spied
 The dun deer browse on the mountain side,
 And numbered their antlered stags with pride,
 As they bathed their sleek and dappled hide
     In the crystal loch beneath.

But not for this sat Sir Hubert there,
Nor sought for such purpose the Hunter's chair,
    Though his steel-bow rested nigh ;
And two noble stag-hounds of visage grim,
With their frame of wire, and length of limb,
    Lay watching their master's eye.

Far other and darker thoughts, I trow,
Set the stamp of care on Sir Hubert's brow,
    For he mused on the fearful ban
That for ages had hung o'er his fated race,
And smitten with death the blooming face
Of each youthful heir that was born to grace
    Bendonald's ancient clan.

Now three hundred years are past and gone
Since the Hag that was burnt on the Hunter's stone
    Had uttered the curse of old ;
And whether t'was sanctioned by Heaven or Hell,
I dare not pronounce, but sooth to tell,
Ever since that hour the terrible spell
    Had accomplished the doom foretold.

And this is the tale of the Witch that died
In the midst of flames on Mal-Nuchrie's side,
    At the top of the Hunter's cairn ;
When the angry Chief of the forest and glen
Had summoned his troop of twice twenty men,
    To perform his mandate stern.

MacEwan the Chief had hunted in vain
Over mountain and moor with all his train,
    For five long weeks and a day ;
And his arrows so keen had all missed their mark,
And his stag-hounds had galloped from day light to dark,
And returned in the gloaming all wearied and stark,
    Nor had held one deer to bay.

Each day that he traversed the forest and moor,
More savage he grew, and more fiercely swore,
That the legions of Hell had combined
To do him despite, that before him they flew
Through the mists of the morning, a shadowy crew,
And frightened the antlered herds from his view,
And leaving a sulphurous taint on the dew,
Had bewildered the scent of his Sleuth-hounds true,
And rode on the eddying wind.

MacEwan the Chief was cruel and hard;
He pummelled his huntsman, and stabbed his bard—
When Donald his son came nigh,
And whispered with awe that the wrinkled Hag,
Who dwelt in the nooks of Bendrachen's crag,
Had blunted his arrows, and saved the stag,
And pent up the wind in a deer-skin bag,
And baffled the scent, and bewildered the drag,
And darkened his gaze-hound's eye.

MacEwan the Chief, he trembled with ire,
His breath came thick, and his eye shot fire,
And his lips were white with foam—
“Betide me, betide me, whate'er betide, Soon I'll unkennel the witch,” he cried;
And soon he mounted the steep hill side,
And swore that the withered crone should ride
On flames to her hellish home.

And while she muttered, “Avaunt, avaunt,”
He dragged her forth from her hated haunt,
And up to the mountain lone,
Where a pile of pine-logs stands prepared,
And a kilted band of his vassals guard
With blazing torches, and daggers bared,
The face of the glowing stone.

And ere they ended her wretched life,
They gashed her veins with the dagger knife
Till the black blood sprang thereout ;
And while she tossed her arms in air,
And madly tore her streaming hair,
They mocked her feeble and dying prayer
With barbarous laugh and shout.

And then they cast upon the pyre
Her heaving corpse begirt with fire ;
And borne on the gathering storm
The ravens in mid-air croaked aloud,
And wheeled and stooped down on the sulphurous cloud
That swathed as with a reeking shroud
Her blistered and blackening form.

When, as the thunder burst above,
A flaming spectre was seen to move
Right upward athwart the smoke ;
And as she hovered the clouds among,
High o'er the terror-stricken throng,
The echos with fiendish laughter rung,
And thus her demon-prompted tongue
Its malediction spoke.

“ Woe, wrath, and revenge on the barbarous man “ Who lords it over his trembling clan,
“ And woe to Bendonald's race—
“ For never from this time forth shall an heir “ Survive to reward his parent's care,
“ But shall die in the bloom of his promise fair,
“ And with weeping, and wailing, and wild despair, “ Shall be laid in his burial place.

“ And when three hundred years be past and gone,
“ The heir at the age of twenty-one “ Shall be numbered among the dead ;
“ When a stag shall be slain from the Hunter’s stone
“ By the hand of the father who weeps for his son,
“ The vengeance shall end which to-day has begun,
    “ And the shafts of fate shall be sped.”

She vanished—the thunder roared amain,
The lightning flashed, and the drenching rain
    Plashed down on the smouldering pile ;
And the noisome heap of ashes was cast
By the winds abroad on the desert waste,
And a troop of ravens and corbies past
In undulations strange and fast,
With a rushing sound on the northern blast,
    To Thule’s Hell-born Isle.

In the self-same hour a shivering came
With ague-fits on young Donald’s frame,
    And bright flashed his kindling eye,
And his tongue was cloven with burning thirst,
And soon it was seen that the Witch accurst
Had chosen her victim, and stricken him first
    Of Bendonald’s heirs to die.

And whether ’twas horror, or whether ’twas grief,
A blindness fell on the childless Chief,
    And MacEwan the stern was seen
To grope his way round his desolate hearth,
That never might ring with its ancient mirth,
And cast himself down on the cold damp earth,
    Bewailing the days that had been.

Now Sir Hubert was not like MacEwan of old,
His heart it was tender, his spirit was bold,
And his temper was gracious and mild ;
And though from his youth he'd a forester been,
Yet oft in the glen might Sir Hubert be seen
To sport with his children, and dance on the green,
And gaze with delight on the fair face and mien
Of young Kenneth his first-born child.

Yet still as he looked you might sometimes trace
An expression of sadness steal over his face,
And cloud the fond father's brow ;
For now had three centuries past and gone
Since the Hag was burnt on the Hunter's stone,
And young Kenneth had lived to be twenty-one ;
And he feared that the Witch's malison
Still hung o'er his race, and threatened his son
With a secret but terrible blow.

And thus to forebodings dire a prey
On the morn of young Kenneth's natal day,
He arose, and wended his lonely way
To Mal-Nuchrie's heights of snow ;
And it seemed as he went, that a phantom like air
Overshadowed his path on the mountain bare
Till he reached the rock of the Hunter's chair,
When he told his beads, and vowed in his prayer
To devote to St. Hubert a chapel fair,
If the Saint would befriend him now.

Devoutly and humbly Sir Hubert prayed
To God and his Patron Saint for aid ;
And scarce had he ended his prayer
When a stag, in the pride of his antlered grace,
The noblest of all the forest race,
Came bounding towards his resting place,
Where he sat in the Hunter's chair.

He remembered the token—he thought of the spell,
He knew that young Kenneth his boy was well,
    And he trusted his prayer had been heard.
Oh, confidence fatal!—oh, moment of woe!—
He planted his foot on the rock below,
And covering the deer with his steel cross-bow,
He marked the true spot for a deadly blow
    With an aim which too rarely hath erred.

The bow-string twanged sharp, and the beautiful stag
On the instant fell over the ridge of the crag,
    When a cry smote Sir Hubert's ear,
So agonized, piteous, convulsive, and loud,
It palsied his limbs, and it curdled his blood,
And fixed him like stone to the spot where he stood
    All unnerved and bewildered with fear.

But soon he rushed forward, and stood on the ledge
Of rock that o'erhung the precipitous edge,
    With Bevis and Oscar before;
But the noble hounds shuddered and moaned with affright,
For the charm that the Witch's foul glamour and spite
Had cast on his vision, was banished outright,
And he saw stretched beneath him, oh terrible sight!
    Young Kenneth all bathed in his gore.

He made but one effort, and cast himself down
On the heather beside his expiring son
    In the frenzy of grief and despair;
Perceiving at once that the prophecy's strain
Was accomplished indeed, that a stag had been slain
By the hand of the father, who weeps but in vain
    For the death of his first-born and heir.

Then a darkness obscured the whole heaven's expanse,
He saw not, he heard not, but sunk in a trance,
    On the breast of his bleeding son ;
And the folds of his vestment were dabbled in blood,
Yet his faith and his courage all trials withstood,
And he inwardly prayed to the Giver of good,
And to holy St. Hubert, the Saint of the wood,
    And murmured "Thy will, Lord, be done."

When sudden his spirits and senses were cheered,
For lo ! in a vision St. Hubert appeared,
    All equipped in his hunting gear ;
And with eyes of compassion and meekly bowed head,
Like an angel he stood o'er the living and dead,
And sadly awhile contemplated
The ravage which vengeance demoniac had made—
    Then he touched the youth's breast with his spear.

"Arise and be thankful," he uttered, and straight
With the look of a Saint, and majestic gait,
    He turned, and was lost to the glance ;
But who shall describe the fond father's surprise,
When he saw from his death couch young Kenneth arise,
And stretch out his arms, and re-open his eyes,
Like a victim redeemed from sacrifice,
    Or a dreamer uproused from his trance.

And when to his bosom his son he held fast,
He scarce could believe that the miracle past
    Had been real, substantial, and true ;
Nor to Kenneth himself was a circumstance shewn,
Not a blow had he felt, not a pang had he known,
For straight with the bow-shot his senses had flown—
But a scar of blood red on his white bosom shone
    At the spot where the bolt had gone through.

And even to this very day 'tis pretended
That the sons of Bendonald, from Kenneth descended,
Still bear the red stain on their breast—
As a sign handed down by the mercy of heaven,
That the crimes of MacEwan the stern were forgiven,
And the foul Witch's curse from their family driven
By the arm of St. Hubert the blest.

And the heart of Sir Hubert rejoiced, and of all
Who abode in the glens from Loch Damph to Achall,
And the coves of the sea-beaten shore;
And the halls of Rhidorrach and Brehen-letter rung
To the pipe of the minstrel, the dance, and the song,
And the quaighs flowed in bumpers repeated and strong
To the health of Sir Hubert and Kenneth the young,
The pride of Mac-Ewan-na-mohr.

THE LUCK OF EDENHALL.

(FROM THE GERMAN.)

Of Edenhall the youthful Lord
 For a sumptuous feast gave trumpet call,
 Then rising at the festive board
 He pledged both knights and ladies all
 A toast in the Luck of Edenhall.

The Musgrave spoke, but with downcast look
 That Castle's ancient Seneschall Forth from its silken casket took
 The precious cup of bright crystalle
 Surnamed the Luck of Edenhall.

"To this time honoured goblet's praise Pour out the red wine of Portugal"
 Trembling the old man poured, and all
 The guests were aware of the purple rays
 That flashed from the Luck of Edenhall.

Again he spoke up, as he raised the cup,
 This goblet rare of the rock crystalle
 "The fairies of yore to my grandsire gave
 At a fountain's brink, and bade him engrave
 In characters fair to be seen by all,
 If ever this glass shall break or fall
 Farewell to the Luck of Edenhall."

Thus it comes to pass by a chalice of glass
 Our family fortunes are held in thrall,
 While we love to quaff the red wine, and laugh
 Till we shiver the glass in our ancient hall,
 The first in the dance and the last in the brawl,
 Now prove we the Luck of Edenhall.

The charm'd cup it rings as the nightingale sings
In a tone soft and varied and musical,
Then it swells like the roaring of a cataract pouring,
Till it rolls like the thunder when the clouds burst asunder,
That splendid charm'd chalice of Edenhall.

“The Musgrave's bold race scorns a frail piece of glass
For a shield and a sword and a fortified wall,
Too long has it lasted—let the value be tested—
Strike the glass, strike the glass—with this last stroke of all Here goes the famed fortune of Edenhall.”

The glass shrilling broke, and the edifice shook
Through the length and the breadth of that stately hall,
And a fiery flash with the ruinous crash
Streamed through the breach of the breaking wall,
With the broken Luck of Edenhall.

And the enemy came with his sword and flame
Rushing in like a flood o'er the rampart wall,
And he fell by the sword that impetuous Lord,
With clenched hand grasping in his fall
The shattered Luck of Edenhall.

But at dawn of day with tresses grey
The Castle's ancient Seneschall
Through the blackened ruins was seen to stray,
Seeking the bones of his Lord where he lay
With the shattered Luck of Edenhall.

“The tower of stone is overthrown”
Feebly murmurs that Henchman lone,
“The stately column and massive wall
From their pride must pass like a shivered glass
Yea! the globe itself shall in fragments fall
Like the broken Luck of Edenhall.”

RIZPAH.

"And Rizpah the daughter of Aiah took sackcloth, and spread it for her upon the rock, from the beginning of harvest until water dropped upon them out of heaven, and suffered neither the birds of the air to rest on them by day, nor the beasts of the field by night."—2 SAMUEL, chap. xxi., v. 10.

She sate through the sun's meridian glare
 Till the midnight dews dropped o'er her—
 In the silence and sadness of stern despair,
 Save when she uplifted her voice to scare
 The beasts of the field or the birds of the air,
 From the ghastly scene before her.

She sate from the days when the yellow corn
 To the reaper's stroke was bending—
 Till the sheaves on the harvest wains were borne,
 And the bleak winds howled through the night forlorn,
 And the rains ushered in th' autumnal morn
 With its misty shroud impending.

The childless mother—the widowed wife
 On a sackcloth mat reposing—
 Weeps for the bygone period, rife
 With vengeance and murder and deadly strife
 That cast their gloom on her weary life
 In the cloudy twilight closing.

What thoughts were hers in her speechless woes
In her long, long nights of waking ?
Whose were those blackening corpses, whose
The stately forms that before her rose ?
Visions of happier days were those
That dealt the last and heaviest throes
To her heart with anguish breaking.

She beheld her boys in the bloom of youth—
She beheld their royal Father !
Till her mind comes back to the fatal truth,
To the mandate that stifled the voice of ruth,
To the sword, and the gibbet trees uncouth,
To the clots of blood that bathe her.

But the Harper of Israel heard, and gave
A last boon to Aiah's daughter—
The only boon that she cared to crave—
And she gathered the bones of the young and brave,
And beside them slept in a peaceful grave
On the banks of Jordan's water.

THE MINSTREL'S CURSE.

(FROM THE GERMAN.)

“ Omnes
Urgentur, ignotique longâ
Nocte, carent quia vate saero.”—HORAT:

In days of yore a castle stood upon a stately height
It looked o'er all the far countrie to th' ocean blue and bright,
And all around were gardens trim, and orchards blooming fair,
And fountains flung their jets aloft, like rainbows in the air.

And there on his ancestral throne a puissant monarch sate,
With sour and angry countenance in stern and solemn state,
And fury reigns within his heart, and terror in his look,
And vengeance in his sentences, and bloodshed in his book.

A pair of noble minstrels tow'rd the castle bent their way,
The son a youth with golden locks, the sire with tresses grey,
The elder bore an ivory harp upon a managed steed,
The blooming boy beside him ran with stripling's strength and speed.

With solemn voice the father spoke, “ Now be prepared my son,
Be ready with your noblest songs, call up your richest tone,
And be the subject grave or gay, exert your utmost art,
This day we'll try to soften the proud King's stony heart.”

Already stand the troubadours within the portal's screen
Before them sit on lofty thrones the monarch and his queen—
The king in dread magnificence like a lurid Northern Light,
The queen in radiance pale and mild, as the silver orb of night.

And now the old man sweeps the strings, he strikes them full and clear,
And rich and richer swell the chords upon the ravished ear—
And like th' angelick chorus thrills the tenor sweet and strong,
And like the Diapason rolls the sire's majestick song.

They sing of happy spring time, of love's enchanting days,
Of freedom, and man's dignity, of constancy and praise—
They sing of all delightful things that soothe the troubled breast,
They sing of honours lost and won, of conflict and of rest.

The throng of tinselled courtiers forget their wonted scorn,
The bravest warriors bow the knee, confess themselves and mourn,
The gentle queen dissolves away in pleasure mixed with pain,
And gives a rosebud from her breast, in guerdon for the strain.

"My subjects you've seduced and would you tempt my queen astray"
The scowling monarch thundered forth, to jealous rage a prey—
He hurled his knife like lightning's flame, and smote the stripling's side,
From whence instead of music's flow, gushed forth the crimson tide.

His head drooped down like lilies pale when overcharged with rain

He sank into his father's arms and never spoke again—

One dying glance he upward cast, a glance that seemed to tell
A tale of love and agony—a long and last farewell—

Then shuddered all that abject swarm, with gloom and fear oppress

To see the gentle youth expire upon his father's breast.

Who throws his mantle over him and sets him on his horse

And binds him upright on the selle, a pale and lifeless corse.

He leaves the hall of murder, through the castle gate he , springs,

He lifts his ivory harp on high and snaps its golden strings—

Against a marble column's base he dashes it asunder,

And thus denounced a prophet's curse in accents like the thunder.

“Wo! Wo! to you proud halls—no more within your fatal bound

“Shall minstrel's harp be heard again, nor song, nor cheerful sound,

“No! only sighs and moaning and the heavy tread of slaves—

“Until the blast of vengeance howl o'er ashes, dust, and graves.

“Wo! Wo! ye blooming gardens! in the lovely light of May “I show you this disfigured corpse, this pale and bloody clay—

“That you like him may wither your fountains all run dry,

“Your gay Parterres for evermore in desolation lie.

“Wo! to thee accursed murderer! of kings the curse and shame!
“In vain be all thy strivings after wreaths of guilty fame—
“But be thy very name o’erwhelmed in everlasting night
“Like a dying soul’s expiring sigh cut off by early blight.”

The father hath denounced his curse, and Heaven hath heard the call—
The massive walls, the pillared halls, in shapeless ruin fall—
One marble column stands alone, the type of ancient power,
That marble column cracked and bowed may sink from hour to hour.

Instead of gay Parterres around—behold a blasted heath
No tree nor shrub gives friendly shade—no river flows beneath:
The tyrant’s very name unknown to history or to verse!
All is lost, and all forgotten—this is the Minstrel’s Curse.

TO THE QUEEN.

ON HER MAJESTY'S LEAVING ENGLAND FOR THE CONTINENT.

Great Queen of Britain's Isles and Sea,
 Of all the Titles borne by thee
     The last is not the least.
 For virtues more than honours famed,
 At length thy subjects see thee named
     Queen of the gorgeous East.

Fair Daughter of her ancient Kings,
 On all her mountains Scotia sings
     Thy praise in heartfelt strains,
 And wearied with domestic strife
 Hibernia wakes to happier life,
     Upon her emerald plains.

Rejoicing once in nuptial state,
 But mourning now th' untimely fate
     Of Him thy bosom's Lord,
 It well becomes thy love to raise
 New honours to thy Hero's praise,
     In life, in death adored.

Lo ! welcomed to his native land,
 Thy Son from India's torrid strand,
     Yelad with new renown
 In his brave ship serenely glides,
 And bears along th' Arabian tides
     His Mother's Eastern crown.

Their gifts the mountain Rajahs bring,
And deck with gems their future King,
    The multitude of Isles
From sea and land their tribute pay,
While Heaven protects his homeward way
    With Summer's sunlit smiles.

Peace guides thy steps, and Piety
In robe unspotted claims for thee
    The homage of the crowd.
The Nation's universal voice
Still hails their Queen, and mobs rejoice
    At sight of one so good.

Then go, great Queen, in triumph go !
May all the winds from Heaven that blow
    Befriend and speed thy course :
May vernal Suns propitious shine,
And each day bring to thee and thine
    New stores of health and force.

1876.

TO AN EAGLE.

Ætherial bird ! that on the mountain's peak,
 Reposing in the sun thy mighty pinions,
 Look'st from thy throne of clouds o'er cliff and creek,
 Or with expanded plumes and sharpen'd beak,
 Rangest at will thy undisturb'd dominions,
 Majestic monarch of the sky !
 How mean appears man's destiny,
 When, sailing in the blue profound,
 Thou wheel'st in measur'd circles round !
 Or borrowest the lightning's speed,
 Such as of old rapt Ganymede
 Beheld thee darting from above
 The winged messenger of Jove !
 Him thy resounding plumage bore
 Aloft from Simois' winding shore,
 To minister in blest abodes,
 An earthborn cupbearer to gods ;
 While his reft flock, o'er Ida driven,
 Gazed on their guardian's flight to heaven.

Bird of rapine ! bird of glory !
 Who, in the page of Grecian story,
 Hath followed Ammon's warrior son
 To Issus' plain from Macedon,
 Nor wondering mark'd thy victor wing,
 High poised above the heroic king !
 He, borne along the waves of war,
 Dash'd on the mitred Persian's car,
 And hail'd thee from his steed of fire,
 Proud omen of his awful sire.

Lordly bird of high dominion !
 Under thine imperial pinion
 Rome her banners wide unfurl'd,
 Mistress of a prostrate world !

From Calpe's cliffs, and Afric's sand,
To sea-girt Thulé's bounding strand ;
From the banks of fair Garonne,
To thy dark ruins, Babylon,
Hear her shouts victorious ring,
Triumphant mark her eagle wing.

“ Bird of conquest, bird of sorrow !
A later tyrant dared to borrow
The splendour of thy magic name,
And nobly won the wreath of fame.
O'er Alpine snows, and Adda's flood,
Trace his ruthless path in blood ;
Austrian maids shall long abhor
Red Marengo's conqueror.
Him Vienna's sons await,
Mourning at her broken gate :
While her Danube's mazy flow
A moment checks th' advancing foe—
How sternly calm th' invader sits
Amid thy carnage, Austerlitz !
How scornful hears, on Jena's plain,
A royal heroine plead in vain !
His star is waned—his race is run !—
Where is dread Napoleon ?
Gallia's eagle backward driven,
Quail'd beneath an arctic heaven ;
Europe's conqueror subdued,
Lies in his rocky solitude :
A thousand leagues of salt sea foam
Have borne him to his island home ;
Here his crimes and sorrows cease—
The mighty exile sleeps in peace.
—— And haply thou, sad bird and lone,
With drooping wing and ruffled plume,
Above the warrior's lowly tomb,
Sit'st like a spirit, on thy mountain throne,
To guard from touch profane his monumental stone.

TO THE FARNE ISLANDS.

Bleak Isles ! where Piety in ancient days
 Her altars founded on the sea-beat shore,
 And white-robed monks sang their Creator's praise
 Amid the tempest's whirl and billow's roar ;
 What though no more that solitary space
 Shall ring with loud Hosannas to the Lord,
 And sea fowl nestle in the sacred place
 Where once the sacramental cup was poured,
 Yet still upon your rugged beach there stands
 A holy Temple undefiled, not made with hands ;

Nor fashioned by the builder's rule and square
 Nor reared as earthly Fanes, with stone and lime,
 But a fair frame, though mortal, that doth bear
 Th' Almighty's impress on her brow sublime ;
 For as the virgin Una undismayed
 Met the grim lion in the lonely wood,
 And brought the lordly savage to her aid,
 Tamed by the dignity of maidenhood ;
 Who sheathed his claws, and lulled his roarings wild
 And crouching at her feet, lay quiet as a child ;

So did She moved by gentle Pity feel
 A more than mortal courage man her breast,
 Nor feared to navigate her fragile keel
 Where eddying breakers reared their snowy crest,
 And demons rode upon the midnight storm
 Bursting in thunder on the fatal rock,
 Where clung for refuge many a shrieking form
 Their vessel shivered by the ghastly shock
 Which plunged at once into eternal sleep
 Their late companions whelmed beneath the surging deep,

In that dark hour of danger and despair
When winds and waters strove with sea and sky,
She only heard the drowning wretch's prayer
She only saw their helpless agony—
And guided by an Arm unseen, a Power
That bids the storm be still and rules the wave,
She succour brought to those who deemed the hour
Of fate inevitable at hand, and gave
New life, new hope, where Death triumphant stood,
And clutched his trembling prey and drank his victim's blood.

Oh ! noble effort, deed of deathless Fame !
From which the strength of man had shrunk appalled,
But that in woman's heart there burnt a flame
By Mercy fired, by Prudence un-enthralled,
The flame of Charity, of Faith, and Love
That lights to deeds illustrious the way,
Sent by the Holy Spirit from above
To sublimiate our grosser part of clay,
And still in Godlike bosoms loves to dwell,
Like ancient Vesta's fire, unquenched, unquenchable.

Honour to thee fair Maid ! for never more
Shall Pilgrim view St. Cuthbert's island surge,
And pause upon the melancholy shore,
That rings its victim's everlasting dirge,
But memory's power shall bring before his eyes
The horrors of that agonizing night,
And to creative Fancy shall arise
That form heroic with her pinnace slight,
Who dared amid a thousand perils save
Her helpless fellow-men from an untimely grave.

Honour to thee, and happiness, fair Maid !

May each succeeding year from hence be fraught
With blessings due to services unpaid

Save by the meed of conscience, and the thought
That thou a chosen vessel of the Lord,

Redeemed and sanctified by Christ His Son
May'st reap in other realms a rich reward,

Approved by Faith, in works already done,
Receive this humble Tribute ! nor disdain

A harp that long hath slept, and ne'er may wake again.

Oct., 1838.

ICE-BERGS AT SEA.

Dread monuments of ancient winter's reign !
 "Mysterious visions ! solemn, cold and vast,
 Drifting before the Hyperborean blast
 Upon the surface of the stormy main,
 Whence are ye come, and whither are ye sent ?
 What Power unseen impelled you forth
 From the bleak icefields of the North,
 And witnessed that stupendous launch
 Amid the thunders of the avalanche
 O'er mazy gulfs and frozen continent ?
 Then stayed your course upon the restless waves
 Which rage and echo round your crystal caves ?
 Agents of th' Almighty's will
 I follow you in fancy still Floating calm, though tempests sweep
 The bosom of the surging deep,
 Wearing on your rugged brow
 Winter's diadem of snow,
 Breathing round your chill career
 Your own unchanging atmosphere,
 And shining when the solar beam
 Quivers in the ocean stream,
 As the Medusan Ægis shone
 Freezing every heart to stone.
 But when the murky midnight flings
 Her mantle o'er the deep,
 And to the wearied helmsman brings
 A snatch of transient sleep ;
 When the moon hides her waning light
 And stars are lost in thickest night,
 What hearts are wakened to despair !
 What shrieks have rent the silent air !

When reeling from the fatal shock
Some gallant vessel homewards bound
Sailing along the blue profound,
By fog and gloom enveloped round
Hath plunged upon that icy rock !
A thousand fathoms down she goes,
The yawning whirlpools o'er her close—
No vestige left—unless when tost
On that inhospitable coast
All bruised and blackened welters there
The form of drowning mariner,
While floating on the billow's crest
The sea birds tear his swollen breast,
Or hovering round with ceaseless clang
Exult in his expiring pang.

What eye hath seen, what tongue can tell
The wondrous forms that yet may dwell
Within these rocks unchangeable ?
For though in solemn state alone
Death sits upon his icy throne,
Yet his dread minister decay
Here leaves untouched the tyrant's prey,
Nor doth corruption dare to haunt
These grotts of living Adamant—
Witness those mighty reliicks strown
On far Siberia's frozen zone
Of Mammoth huge or Mastodon !
Witness yon ice-bound rock, which rent
To fragments in its sheer descent
Disclosed a giant form within Clad in the self-same flesh and skin
That once had braved these gales that blow
From banks of everlasting snow,
That once had roamed these regions wide,
And bathed in ocean's azure tide,
Ere man himself had sprung to birth
Upon a monster-peopled earth.

Nor marvel that in wild amaze
Groups of Tungusian hunters gaze
On remnants of an ancient world
Before them in confusion hurled—
Awe-struck to see that carcase bare,
Proboscis huge and matted hair,
Colossal tusk and massive tooth
Capacious paunch and ribs uncouth,
Whose taint hath lured from distant rocks
The grizzled wolf, and yelping fox,
And carrion fowl that thirst for blood
To feast on prediluvian food.

In ages past, ere yet this globe
Combined of primal elements
Lay teeming 'neath a verdant robe
Distinct in seas and continents,
Or ever the vivific sun
With daily circuit had begun
The firm concrete to fertilize,
Or gentle dews, and showery skies
Their sweet and changeful influence shed
On the green earth's compacted bed,
Huge ice-bergs might be seen to pass
Erratic o'er the fluent mass,
Or left by the subsiding flood
Imbedded in chaotic mud.
Nor deem that these are fancies vain
Engendered in a poet's brain,
Or such day dreams as might occur
To planet-struck philosopher,
For lo! upon the wide champaign
Of Poland's and Silesia's plain,
And in those wildernesses where Beneath another hemisphere,
The desert Pampas stretch below
Majestic Andes' wall of snow,

Plains where the lassoed Gauchos ride
In freedom by La Plata's side,
And condors in their airy course
Attack and tear the wearied horse,
Huge granite boulders sometime rent
From Alpine ridge and battlement
Lie scattered o'er the sandy waste
Memorials of the wondrous past.
And still from those crystalline spires
That crown th' Antartie "Isle of Fires"
Disrupted glaciers falling spread
Confusion wide o'er ocean's bed
All laden with the mountain spoil
Of granite rock, and frozen soil,
Before whose launch the reflux surges borne
Roll back Magellan's wave, and lash the cliffs of Horn.

THE MOORS.

The moors ! the moors ! the bonny brown moors !
 Shining and fresh with April showers !

When the wild birds sing
 The return of spring,
 And the gorse and the broom
 Shed the rich perfume
 Of their golden bloom,

'Tis a joy to revisit the bonny brown moors.
 Aloft in the air floats the white sea-mew,
 And pipes his shrill whistle the grey curlew,
 And the peewit gambols around her nest
 And the heath-cock crows on the mountain crest,
 And freely gushes the dark brown rill
 In cadence sweet from the lonely hill,
 Where mingling his song with the torrent's din
 As it hubbles and foams in the rocky linn,
 Twitters and plunges the water-crow
 In the pool where the trout are springing below :
 And the lambs in the sunshine leap and play
 With their bleating dams on the grassy brae
 With a withered thorn for their trysting place,
 To mark the goal where their footprints trace
 The narrow course of their sportive race ;
 Oh ! know ye the region in spring more fair
 Than the banks and the glens of the moorland bare !

The moors ! the moors ! the fragrant moors !
 When the heather breaks forth into purple flowers !

When the blazing sun
 Through the Crab hath run,
 And the Lion's wrath
 Inflames his path,

What garden can vie with the glowing moors.

The light clouds seem in mid-air to rest
On the dappled mountain's misty breast,
And living things bask in the noontide ray
That lights up the summer's glorious day,
Nor a sigh of wind, nor a sound is heard
Save the faint shrill chirp of some lonely bird,
Save the raven's croak or the buzzard's cry
Or the wild bee's choral minstrelsy,
Or the tinkling bell of the drowsy flock
Where they lie in the shade of the caverned rock.
But when the last hues of declining day
Are melted and lost in the twilight grey,
And the stars peep forth, and the full orb'd moon
Serenely looks down from her highest noon,
And the rippling water reflects her light,
Where the birch and the pine tree deepen the night,
Oh ! who but must own his proud spirit subdued
By the calm of the desert solitude,
So balmy, so silent, so solemnly fair
As if God were riding the mountain air,
And night commune with man on the moorland bare.

The moors ! the moors ! the joyous moors !
When autumn displays his golden stores—
    When the morning's breath
    Blows across the heath
    And the fern waves wide
    On the mountain side,
    'Tis gladness to ride
At the peep of dawn o'er the dewy moors.
For the sportsmen have mounted the topmost crags
And the fleet dogs bound o'er the mossy hags,
And the mist clears off as the lagging sun
With his first ray gleams on the glancing gun,
And the startled grouse and the black-cock spring
At the well-known report upon whirring wing.

Or wander we north where the dun deer go
Unrestrained o'er the summits of huge Ben-y-glo,
And Glen Tilt and Glen Bruar re-echo the sound
Of the hart held to bay by the deep-mouthed blood-hound.
And the eagle stoops down from Shechallion to claim
With the fox and the raven his share of the game.
But a cloud hath o'er-shadowed the forest and waste
And the Angel of Death on the whirlwind hath past,
*And the coronach rings on the mountains of Blair
For the lord of the woods and the moorlands bare.

The moors ! the moors ! the desolate moors !
When the mist thickens round and the tempest roars.
    When the monarch of storm
    Rears his giant form
    On some rock-built throne
    That he claims for his own,
To survey the wild war on the desolate moors.
For the winds are let loose, and the sound is gone forth
To awaken the troops of the frozen North ;
And the lightning and hailstone and hurricane fly
At a wave of his arm through the dark rolling sky,
And his footsteps are trampling the fog and the cloud
That envelop the earth in a funeral shroud ;
And the sheep and the shepherd lie buried below
The wide spreading folds of his mantle of snow ;
And the breath of his nostril encumbers the wood,
And his fetters of crystal arrest the flood ;
And he binds in its fall the cataract,
And makes level the gulfs of the mountain tract,
Till his work is complete, and a dread repose
Broods over a boundless waste of snows,
And the wild winds bewail in whispers drear
The decay and the death of the by-gone year.

1833.

*In allusion to the death of the Duke of Atholl.

SONG OF THE DEER-STALKER.

IN ATHOLL.

Awake and be stirring, the daylight's appearing
The wind's in the South, and the mountains are clearing,
A thousand wild harts in the forest are feeding,
Some few of those harts before night shall lie bleeding.

Make ready both rifles, the old and the new,
And sharpen the edge of the rusted "Skene-dhu"
Let your telescopes gleam in the rising sun,
We'll have need of them ere the daylight be done.

George Murray was off before light to Glen Tilt,
And Faskally's Laird has just tied on his kilt,
And Peter and Charlie are waiting below
The cloud-mantled summits of High Ben-y-Glo.

Now spur on your ponies, and haste to the slaughter
Where the Tilt and the Tuarfe mix their eddying water
The ravens have spied us, and croak as they wheel
O'er the antlered heads of their destined meal.

Now brace up your sinews, give play to your lungs,
Keep open your eyes, and keep silent your tongues,
And follow with cautious, and stealthy tread
The foresters' footsteps wherever they lead.

Here pause we a moment—while yonder slope
He surveys with the balanced telescope—
By heaven ! he sees them—just under the hill
The pride of the forest lie browsing and still.

“ Yon moss must be past ere we gain our shot—
’Tis full five hundred yards to the fatal spot”—
So near has he reckoned that as we crawl by,
Lo the points of their horns on the line of the sky.

We have traversed the flat, and we lurk behind
A rock to recover our nerve and our wind,
Hist ! the calves are belling, and snuffing the air
Two jealous old hinds to the front repair.

But the herd are alarmed, and over the height
The leading hinds have advanced into sight—
“ Hold—hold your hand, till the antlers appear,
For the heaviest harts are still in the rear.”

Crack, crack, go the rifles—for either shot
A noble hart bleeding sinks on the spot—
The third ball has missed, but the hindmost stag
Was struck by the fourth, as he topt the crag.

Uncouple the lurchers—right onward they fly,
With long out-stretching limb, and with fire-flashing eye
On the track of his blood they are winging their way,
Yon deer in one minute shall stand at bay.

Magnificent creature ! to reach thee I strain
Through forest and glen, over mountain and plain,
Yet now thou art fallen, thy fate I deplore
And lament that the reign of thy greatness is o’er.

Where now is that courage, late bounding and high,
That acuteness of scent, and that brilliance of eye,
That fleetness of foot, which out-speeding the wind
Had so often left death and destruction behind ?

Thine heart's blood is streaming, thy vigour gone by,
Thy fleet foot is palsied, and glazed is thine eye !
The last hard convulsion of death has come o'er thee,
Magnificent creature ! who would not deplore thee.

Coir-na-Minghie has rung to the rifle's first crack,
And the heights of Ben-vedi shall echo it back—
Glen-Croinie's wild caverns shall start at the cheer
Of the blood-hound that traces the fugitive deer.

By the gods, 'tis a gallant beginning, hurra !
Diana hath smiled on the hunters to-day !
In the sports of the morning come, Goddess, and share,
And Bacchus shall meet us returning to Blair.

1833.

FAREWELL TO THE HIGHLANDS.

Farewell to the land where the blue misty mountains
 Environ the prospect on every side,
 Where each Corri pours forth its perennial fountains
 To swell the broad river's precipitous tide.

Farewell to the roebuck and red-deer bounding
 Along the brown heath like a meteor afar—
 Farewell to the dark-kilted clansmen surrounding
 The lords of the forest in Athol and Mar.

Farewell Invercauld! to thy proud cliffs inclosing
 Sweet valleys that slumber in sunshine below—
 Farewell to the lodge of the forest reposing
 Beneath the broad shadows of high Ben-y-glo.

Farewell to the pine trees, where satiate with slaughter
 The eagle stoops down from the gathering storm—
 Such as fling their rude branches o'er Dee's foaming water
 Or clothe the steep bases of snowy Cairngorm.

Farewell to the bright lakes of Katrine and Lomond
 To the birches that shade each meandering burn,
 Farewell to the tower where the Chieftain of Drummond
 Surveys his domains over distant Strathearn.

Farewell to the *palace, where rays of past glory
Like autumnal reflections of sun-set still shine
On those walls where the banquet, the song, and the story
Recall to remembrance the days of "Lang Syne."

Farewell to the kind-hearted Lady of Freeland,
To each friend of the dance, of the chase and the fell,
The Hunter that wends his way home from the Hieland
To each and to all of you breathes a farewell.

THE WATERSIDE.

To the waterside, to the waterside !
 At the early dawn, or at eventide,
 In the blaze of noon
 Or beneath the moon
 Still let us go by the waterside,
 And there the passing hours beguile
 With not unpleasing melancholy talk.
 How, like the stream, our life the while
 Flows gently down its channel as we walk,
 And bears along its course the hopes and fears,
 The pleasures and the pains of past and present years.
 Or, seated on a rocky ledge,
 We listen to the breeze's sigh,
 That through the green and bending sedge
 Doth make Æolian harmony ;
 Or mark it chase the fleeting shadows
 Whirled in simultaneous error
 Of weeping trees and verdant meadows,
 Procumbent o'er the watery mirror,
 Which anon were clear and steady,
 Save where the light phosphoric broke
 In flashes from the casual eddy,
 Curling round a sunken rock,
 And think that thus the breath of age
 Scatters th' enchanting dreams of youth,
 Which seemed to spread as bright a page,
 As fair an image of the truth.
 Alas ! the sun that rose so fair
 Hath hid in clouds his golden hair.
 The midday storm hath swept around,
 Friends have proved false, and fortune frowned ;
 The dream is fled, the image gone,
 And we are in the world alone.

Or let us banish thoughts of sorrow,
Mirth shall welcome in the morrow.
Now soft vernal showers befriending
The fisher's gentle craft unlock
Adown the furrowed hills descending,
Rich pasture for the finny flock :
'Mid the torrent's fiercest spout
See the mighty salmon wallow :
See the variegated trout
Springing in the pebbly shallow,
Care and sorrow flee away !
Let politicians fret and wrangle !
From the morn's first ray to the close of day,
We will angle, we will angle !
Ye pale-eyed students ponder over
Tomes of philosophic lore,
Go, hang thyself, despairing lover !
Courtly minions cringe before
The magic rod by office borne,
Look here, at your own image look !
A bauble hangs you up to scorn,
Like fish upon a gilded hook :
Never struggle to be free,
A riband cramps your energy,
Purchased at too dear a cost,
Fidelity and honour lost.
Money-scraping citizens
Hived within your dingy dens,
Sum your debts, and count your gains,
Gold and silver bring their pains ;
But streams in vernal joyaunce flowing,
And breezes o'er the dim woods blowing,
And birds the early dawn saluting,
And fishes through the bright waves shooting,
Ephemeral insects upward streaming.
Gay flowers in dewy pastures gleaming,
And stately herds, whose lengthened shadows
Slant far athwart the sun-lit meadows ;

These, miser, these are Nature's treasures,
With these are never-failing pleasures—
Treasures that the poor inherit—
Pleasures that exalt the spirit,
And raise us from a world of sin and care
To Him who dwells above and hears our humble prayer.
May He protect our course, a Guardian kind
Vouchsafing still the sunshine of the mind ;
Smooth each obstruction that in early years
Our progress ruffled down the vale of tears,
And cheer our passage to that unknown sea
That opens darkly on Eternity ;
Then guide our Spirit to that blissful shore
Where Sin and Death are not, and Time shall be no more.

TO THE NORTH WIND.

Breeze austere ! that comest forth
 From the chambers of the North,
 Riding on the restless seas
 That lash the storm-swept Orcades,
 Clothing next in robe of white
 Proud Crampian cliffs, and Pentland's height ?
 Thence careering far and fast
 Over Cheviot's snowy waste,
 Sweeping oft in various current
 Down each mountain, glen, and torrent ;
 Driving next o'er Tynedale fells
 Through wooded Yorkshire's leafy dells,
 O'er Lincoln wold, and Cambridge down
 Welcome to the crowded Town,
 Though London's puny children fear
 Thy frowning brow, and breath severe,
 And shiver like the aspen pale
 Bending in th' autumnal gale.

Viewless Spirit ! onwards driven
 Welcome to a Southern heaven !
 Did'st thou linger by the side
 Of Aln, or Coquet's pebbly tide,
 And take a momentary stand
 In mountainous Northumberland ?
 Who are they that wandering there
 With sunburnt cheek and flowing hair,
 Young barbarians of the moor
 Greet thy visage stern and hoar
 And chase thine echoes through the pines
 That wave o'er Thrunton's craggy lines,
 Nor dread thy salutation rude
 On Rimside's heathery solitude.

Viewless Spirit ! turn again
From the noisy haunts of men ?
Nor forget in flying forth
To tell these children of the North
How their father prison-pent
Pants for a purer element,
As the fettered eagle sighs
For desert cliffs and boundless skies.
Tell them how he dreams of hills
Forests lone and glittering rills
And fairy forms, that round him glide
Gathering flowerets by his side.
And oh ! dread Spirit softly pour
Thy blast across the shrouded moor
That fences in the stream of Aln
Down his tributary vale.
Nor in gleams insidious drest
Creep into the Virgin's breast
Nor blight the budding rose that streaks
With hues of health her glowing cheeks,
Nor dim the lustre of the eye
That sheds its grace on infancy.
But spare the lamb that totters round
Her mother on the frozen ground,
Nor smite the nestling bird that springs
To life beneath its parent wings,
Nor nip the tender plants that rear
Their buds to greet the early year.
But give them all thine energy
In health to live in age to die.

THE SNOW.

From realms of purest æther
 November's scowling cloud
 Hath borne me downwards hither,
 The dead earth's form to shroud.

Careering o'er the Atlantic,
 I mingle with the roar
 Of breakers dashing frantic
 On frozen Labrador.

And on the iceberg sailing,
 I hear the drowning cry
 Of shipwrecked crews bewailing
 Their stranded argosy.

At Cotopaxi's portal,
 On Chimborazo's dome,
 I sit where step of mortal
 Hath never dared to come :—

Where soars the mighty condor,
 A speck in middle sky,
 And men gaze up with wonder
 That aught can live so high.

In lone Helvetian valley,
 'Mid Alpine solitudes,
 I clasp the goatherd's châlet,
 I shake the groaning woods.

Beyond the Greenland mountains,
Beyond the Polar waves,
Where ocean's azure fountains
Congeal in crystal caves ;

Beneath the moonlight sleeping
I spread my curtain where Their carnival are keeping
The walrus and the bear.

Where Life exists no longer,
And silence holds her reign,
And Want and Cold and Hunger
For victims wait in vain :

In unapproached dominion
Beyond them all, alone
I fold my feathered pinion
Around my Arctic throne.

Yet one soft warning spoken,
One sunny glance may view
My rod of empire broken,
And melt me into dew.

THE SCYTHIAN WINTER.

FROM VIRGIL, III. GEORGIC.

Not so where Scythian Tribes in deserts stray
 And broad Mæotis' frozen pool survey,
 Where Rhodope withdraws her mountain flank
 From Ister's turbid stream and icy bank ;
 There flocks and herds are folded, nor appear
 Leaves on the trees nor grass for half the year,
 But every land-mark, every path is lost,
 In shapeless heaps of snow and blinding frost,
 And clad in storms unbroken Winter reigns
 Wide o'er the desert hills, and boundless plains.
 Nor ever doth the sun dispel the gloom
 When rising pallid from his Eastern room,
 His tardy coursers climb the sky, nor when He bathes his chariot in the Western main.
 The icy crust congeals on running streams,
 And o'er the surface roll the harnessed teams ;
 And inland seas where navies lately rode,
 Now seem t'invite the ponderous waggon's load.
 And brazen vessels crack, and clothes for wear
 Turn rigid in the keen and biting air ;
 While in the cellars men before they dine
 With hatchets cleave the blocks of humid wine
 In solid ice are bound the liquid lakes,
 And tangled beards are stiff with icy flakes.

Meanwhile down pours the snow—the woolly sheep
 Perish by scores, and in the drifted heap
 The mighty ox, o'ertaken by the storm,
 Floundering in vain lays down his prostrate form ;
 And herds of stags benumbed lie buried low,
 Their pointed antlers bristling through the snow.

These not with eager hounds nor treacherous snare,
Nor painted feathers dangling in the air,
Do men pursue, but as they strive in vain
With panting breast to burst that icy chain,
The hunter at close quarters with his knife
The groaning quarry stabs, and ends the strife.
Thence to their caves deep dug beneath the soil,
They drag with cheery shouts the bleeding spoil ;
And sheltered from the blast spend night and day
In mirth and jollity, and tipsy play,
Huge logs of oak and elm still piling higher,
To feed the fuel of their smouldering fire ;
And imitate the fruit of Southern vines,
With sour fermented drinks and home-brewed wines.
Such barbarous tribes beneath the Polar star,
In Arctic deserts wage continued war
With adverse element and angry sky,
'And clad in skins the Winter's wrath defy.

STANZAS

IN MATREM CARISSIMAM.

Sages have said that nought on earth
 Is fixed, or permanent, or true,—
 That all is change to death from birth,
 A shadowy dream, a fleeting view.

And poets sing of fading flowers,
 Of chequer'd skies, and restless seas ;
 Of pleasures transient as the hours
 That glide along the passing breeze ;

While man himself keeps silent pace
 With Nature's ever-varying doom,
 And runs the universal race
 Between the cradle and the tomb.

That race he runs with toil and care,
 With throbbing heart and lab'ring breath ;
 Whose road is sin, whose hopes are air,
 Whose joys are pains, whose goal is death :

Sees as he runs, each changing moon
 Her destined change of seasons bring ;
 Each night's repose succeed to noon,
 Each winter lead the year to spring :

And should he turn aside to cherish
Some fairer flower that decks the way,
A moment sees its beauty perish,
Or taints its fragrance with decay.

A few short hours remain to drink
Life's troubled dregs, of bitter taste ;
A pause upon the churchyard's brink,
A throb—a pang, and all is past.

Is there then nought secure or fixed ;
No resting place this side the grave ?
No shelt'ring olive bough betwixt
The shifting sand and whelming wave ?—

No bright Oasis of the waste,
Where weary travellers awhile
Reposing from their breathless haste,
May greet a sympathizing smile ?

Yes—if from birth the will of Heaven
Decree to man a life of care ;—
From the same instant God hath given
A mother's heart our pain to share ;

A mother's hand to guide our steps,
A mother's eye to watch our ways ;
A mother's voice to teach our lips
The suppliant's prayer, the hymn of praise.

And from the hour when first her breast
Pillow'd in warmth our infant head,
To that when everlasting rest
Shall shroud her in its narrow bed :

In every change of tide or time,
In summer's heat, in winter's snow,
In every age, in every clime,
In guilt, in danger, or in woe :

Though foes may hate, and friends may leave us,
Though all our hopes delusive prove ;
Though women smile as they deceive us,
And rend the heart they swore to love.

Whether in pleasure's lap of down,
We idly waste the precious day ;
Or, chill'd by dark misfortune's frown,
Lament those hours we've cast away ;

Whether our young ambition soar
To worship glory's rising star,
Nor dreams the idol we adore
May crush us 'neath her iron car ;

In sickness, solitude, or shame,
Whate'er betide this mortal state,
A mother's heart is still the same
In each vicissitude of fate.

There is the bough whereon is placed
Brief refuge from a stormy life ;
There the Oasis of the waste,
A sunny spot, secure from strife.

And when inexorable Death
Shall mix her ashes with the sod,
Her soul shall plead for those beneath,
Before the judgment throne of God.

A VOICE FROM POLAND.

OSTROLENKA.

Dark shadows as of coming rain
 Obscured the close of day,
 When stretched before my view the plain
 Of Ostrolenka lay.

Seemed that the light of Poland's star,
 Her day of hopes and fears,
 That once had flung its radiance far,
 Was setting now in tears.

But clear and calm the stream pursued
 His course towards the sea,
 Late with the noblest blood imbued
 Of Poland's chivalry.

So Time rolls onward still, and bears
 Along His ceaseless flow
 The annals of revolving years,
 Their deeds of crime and woe.

As on I went, a fabric proud,
 A pyramid of stone,
 Marked where the Scythian's armed crowd
 Stood when the strife was done.

Marked where the soldier with his horse
 Slept in a trophied grave,
 Fought his last fight, and ran the course
 Of each imperial slave.

And thus, I thought, on Shinar's plain
The tower presumptuous rose,
When God dispersed its builders vain,
Denouncing them His foes.

Scattered about o'er mound and fosse,
In perishable wood,
Emblem of faith, the lowly cross,
A frail memorial stood.

As if the Czar's colossal power,
Had set his token here,
And Poland in her dying hour
Had fled for refuge there.

For there, they said, the martyred Pole
Fell on his native sod,
And gave for Freedom's sake his soul
A sacrifice to God :

Thought, as his life-blood trickled forth,
Of Sobieski's fame,
When champions of the hardy north
Saved Christendom from shame :

Thought of his own despairing land
When Kosciusko fell,
What time the fierce barbarian's band
Stormed Praga's citadel :

And breathed a thankful prayer that he Had burst a tyrant's chain,
And fought and died a patriot free
On Ostrolenka's plain.

ALCINA'S GARDEN.

(FROM ARIOSTO.)

The place where lighted down Ruggiero's steed
 Folding his feathered pinions, was a plot
 Of such surpassing beauty, that indeed
 Upon the Earth's wide surface, you may not (Whitherso'er your wandering footsteps lead)
 Behold a more enchanting lovely spot,
 Fair cultured plains, soft undulating hills,
 Green meadows, shady glens, and crystal rills.

Sweet groves were there of laurel, and of palm,
 The scented myrtle, and the cedar tall,
 And fruits, and flowers of orange and of balm
 Enwreathed in various forms and beauteous all,
 Which in the summer noon a grateful calm
 Breathed all around beneath that leafy pall,
 Among whose boughs secure the Nightingale
 Poured forth by day and night her fitful wail.

Among the roses red and lilies white
 Which freshly bloom on that enamelled mead,
 Rove hares and coney undisturbed with fright,
 And lordly stags lift high their antlered head,
 Nor fear the treacherous toils, nor arrow's flight
 But unsuspecting ruminant when fed,
 And nimble Roe, and Kids skip all around,
 Which ever in such Alpine solitudes abound.

THE BELLS OF BOTTREUX :

A CORNISH LEGEND.

INTRODUCTION :

ADDRESS TO A WILD WOOD DOVE.

Lend me thy wings, sweet dove !
 That through the liquid air
 And labyrinthine grove
 Dost spread thy pinions, where
 A tender loving mate
 Thine advent doth await,
 And fills with wailing notes the forest round,
 Where plaintive Echo sits, and mocks that plaintive sound.

So on the rolling deep,
 The home-bound mariner
 By wave-worn Calpe's steep
 Or stormy Finisterre,
 Unfurls his canvas wide,
 And fearless skims the foam,
 Through shoals on either side
 Where buoys and beacons guide
 The venturous seaman home :
 Whom loving wife and tender children strain
 Close to their very hearts, with " Welcome home " again.

Not always doth the bark
 Her destined harbour reach,
 Nor cleave the waters dark
 In safety to the beach ;
 The sentence stern and sad
 That oft o'ertakes the bad,
 Learn ye ! who listen to the lay
 That tells the lapless fate
 Of that ill-omened freight,
 Beneath the billows whelmed in Cornish Bottreux' Bay.

---

Fair was the breeze and calm the sea
 That sped the gallant bark,
 To her destined haven in Bottreux Bay
 Between noontide and dark.

Charged was that bark with a holy freight
Of newly-cast church bells,
For the tower that looks down from Bottreux' height
On the tide as it falls and swells.

And now at full sail the vessel wore,
With the harbour right in view,
Round the beetling cape of that rocky shore
Which encloses the bay of Bottreux.

"Thank God for His mercies !" the Pilot cried,
Our cargo's safe I ween ;
"We've weathered the dangers of wind and tide,
And are welcomed home again.

"No more Tintagel's tower shall boast
That her's is the only chime,
"To rouse the echoes of this rude coast
At sunset or matin prime.

"Though in days of old from Pendragon's hold,
From Tintagel's palace hall,
"They tolled the dirge o'er the sullen surge
For King Arthur's funeral.

"See where our townsmen throng the shore,
To join with us in praise
"And thanks to that Almighty Power,
Who watches all our ways."

"Nay, rather give thanks to the good sound planks,"
The boisterous Captain spoke ;
"To the planks we tread, and the sails overhead,
And our Cornish hearts of oak.

" These are the only gods we care
To thank for a lucky trip,
" Then keep for the land your canting and prayer, Keep silence on board my ship."

" Nay sir," said the Pilot, "'tis surely well
To think on the Lord at sea,
" When the winds and waters rage and swell,
With breakers on the lee ;

" When the moon hides her waning light
And stars are lost to view,
" And gathering rain-clouds veil the night,
In robes of blackest hue :

" Shall we not breathe a fervent prayer,
That His Almighty Power
" May guard the ship with constant care,
And shield us in such hour ?"

But still with curses fierce and loud,
That godless man replies,
And with brutal oaths, and vauntings proud,
And scornful blasphemies.

Then from the black abyss* below
Uprose a phantom form,
And waved to the curl-cloud gathering slow,
And summoned the rising storm.

Right overhead the waterspout
Burst full on that fated boat,
With a cyclone blast, that whirled her about
Like a leaf on the waters afloat ;

* Known as the Black Pit.

And a peal from heaven's own arsenal
Was heard as the bark went down,
Like the warning angel's trumpet call
To haughty Babylon.

Down went that bark with her hapless crew,
And her freight of silver bells,
Which ne'er shall be rung from the heights of Bottreux,
On the tide as it falls and swells.

But a broken spar to the Pilot's aid
Was sent by some friendly hand,
Or that God to whom he trusted and prayed,
And he drifted safe to land.

And still when the storm rages high overhead,
Those bells with measured toll,
Send a warning voice from their ocean bed,
Far away on the billows roll.

And the helmsman who hears those solemn tolls,
Will put his helm a-lee,
And breathe a prayer for the guilty souls
That are sunk in the deep, deep sea.

THE ROSES OF TOWTON MOOR:

A BALLAD.

"Αἷμα ρόδων τικτεῖ νιφάδες δὲ τὰδ' ἄνθος-μα λευκά.

The battle of Towton Moor between the Parties of York and Lancaster, the former headed by King Edward IV., the latter by King Henry VI., was fought on Palm Sunday, A.D. 1461, and ended with the utter defeat of the Lancastrians. While these were advancing to the charge at the onset, a violent snow-storm, driving full in their faces, blinded the Archers, and rendered useless their discharge of arrows against their opponents. These, following up their first advantage, drove the Lancastrian army before them after an obstinate contest of nine hours' duration. The victorious Yorkists gave no quarter during the disastrous retreat, and it is said that 36,000 souls perished on this bloody field. The plain of Towton Moor to this day is covered with wild roses, red and white, which spring up every season, and are said to be ineradicable from the soil, but refuse to take root elsewhere.

Oh the red, and the white Rose, as all the kingdom knows
Were emblems of the foes in a sad and cruel work—
When old England's noblest blood was poured out in a flood
To quench the burning feud of Lancaster and York.

For then the rival Roses worn by the rival Houses
This poor distracted nation into rage and frenzy drove,
Tore the children from the mother, tore the sister from the brother,
And the broken hearted lover from the lady of his love.

When the Percys, Veres, and Nevilles, left their castle halls and revels
To rush like raging devils, into the deadly fight
And loyalty and reason were confounded by the treason—
That cast into a prison the King of yester night.

Oh the red and the white Rose upon Towton Moor it grows,
And red and white it blows upon that swarth for ever-more ;
In memorial of the slaughter when the red blood ran like water,
And the victors gave no quarter in the flight from Towton Moor.

When the banners gay were beaming and the steel cuirasses gleaming,
And the martial music streaming o'er that wide and lonely
heath,
And many a heart was beating that dreamed not of retreating
Which ere the sun was setting, lay still and cold in death.

When the snow that fell at morning lay as a type and warning
All stained and streaked with crimson like the roses white and red,
And filled each thirsty furrow with its token of the sorrow
That wailed for many a morrow in the mansions of the dead.

Now for twice two hundred years when the month of March appears
All unchecked by plough or shears spring the roses red and white,
Nor can the hand of mortal close the subterranean portal
That gives to life immortal these emblems of the fight.

And as if they were enchanted not a flower may be transplanted
From those fatal precincts haunted by the spirits of the slain,
For howe'er the root you cherish it shall fade away and perish
When removed beyond the marish of Towton's gory plain.

But old Britannia now wears a rose upon her brow
That blushing still doth glow like the Queen of all her race,
The Rose that blooms Victorious and ever bright and glorious Shall continue to reign o'er us in her mercy, love, and grace.

FIAT LUX.

ADDRESSED TO MY DEAR FRIEND LORD WILLOUGHBY
DE ERESBY AFTER THE OPERATION OF COUCHING FOR CATARACT.

“ Let there be light” the Eternal Word
At earth’s creation spoke,
Primæval night submissive heard,
And light through Chaos broke.

And all the Heavenly Host on high
God’s angel ministers,
Loud anthems sang in harmony
With musick of the spheres.

And from the watery waste below
The mist of darkness cleared,
Before that Word retiring slow
As the young earth appeared.

Pleased at the new and glorious sight
The great Creator stood,
Divided darkness from the light
And saw that it was good.

And still we see each changing moon
Her change of seasons bring,
Each night’s repose succeed to noon,
Each winter lead to spring ;

And still we bless the glorious light
    Offspring of Heaven first-born,
And hail with joy the promise bright
    Of each returning morn.

Then oh ! how sad the lot of him
    Blind wanderer on his way,
Whose visual orb suffused and dim
    Denies its wonted ray.

To whom each day as night is dark,
    And each fair prospect hid,
And at one entrance every spark
    Of knowledge quite forbid.

Yet men have lived of ancient date,
    To whom the Muse hath given
Such visions in their eyeless state
    As seem sent down from Heaven.

Thus Homer sang of gods and men,
    And Milton spirit-fired
Soared into heights beyond the ken
    Of mortal uninspired.

And Willoughby perchance to thee
    Some inward radiance shone
Of power to chase the world's ennui,
    And check the rising groan ;

Such consolation sure was thine
    In those long hours of night,
Which Hope and Patience—maids divine
    Cheered in their tardy flight.

Thine were the steady heart and eye
The scutcheon without stain,
Borne by the brave Lord Willoughby
In wars of swarthy Spain.

And sure they stood thee in good stead
Of youth's forgotten glow,
When fourscore years their snows had shed
Upon thy silvered brow :

For when the hour of trial came,
That steady heart and eye
Unflinching still remained the same
While friends stood trembling by.

"Let there be light" the artist spoke
And at his magic word
The light once more through shadows broke
On Eresby's patient Lord.

LE DIMANCHE À PARIS.

(DIALOGUE.)

Demain c'est le Dimanche ! oh what a day of fun !
 Of all de days in all de week, dis beat dem every one :
 Il y aura cent et mille choses, for us to go and see,
 You and our cousin Hippolyte, et la chere Amelie.

Dese stupides Anglais go to Church, but we'll to our Café,
 And smoke cigars till twelve o'clock and eat our dejeuner,
 Den jump into an omnibus, for at Versailles you know
 Dey run de race of Derby, and dey make le jeu des eaux.

And den by de chemin de fer which drop us at St. Cloud,
 We take our petite promenade by couples, two and two,
 And at la Folie d' Asnieres we finish de soirée,
 And dance and sing and drink and flirt until de break of day."

" Ah mon Ami, dis cannot be—have you not heard de news,
 How two balloons are going up pour monter aux cieux,
 De one is from de Champ de Mars vid honnête Mr. Green, De oder from de Hippodrome vid Madame Celestine."

" Bah les ballons ! toujours de même, déjà c'en est assez—
 I wish Sir Green shall break his neck—le vil perfide Anglais—Viens je te prie mon cher Ami, pour voir jaillir les eaux, Et sur la plaine de Satory, la course des chevaux."

" Ah quelle opiniatreté ! sachez que le ballon
 Qui va partir du Champ de Mars, vill not go up alone—
 But brave Sir Green de sa machine suspendu dans les airs,
 Will dere be seen with Madame Green, all in a coach and pair.

And on de dickey dere will be a flunkey and a maid,
 And a postboy on de horses' back in jockey boots arrayed,
 And dus de equipage will fly to Meudon or Marly,
 And den drive back along de road pour souper à Paris.

But if too great shall be de weight of flunkey and of maid,
 Or if by jockey and his horse de voyage be delayed, Sir Green is so déterminéd de ne manquer à son but Dat he shall let dem one by one tomber en parachute."

" Ah mon Ami ! que dis tu là ? oh sacrebleu, diable !
 Ah qu'il est drôle ce joli Green, mais c'est inconcevable !
 Tiens ça ! mon cher, demain we ge unto de Champ de Mars,
 Pour voir la famille Green monter en voyage to de stars."

The Sabbath morn arrives at last and bright the sun looks down
 Thro' an atmosphere serene and clear upon the sparkling town
 But few he sees on bended knees a Christian's faith declare,
 And few that seek the house of God in penitence and prayer.

For crowding down each avenue and promenade, and street,
 There moves along a countless throng to see this wondrous feat,
 And there among the first arrived upon the dusty quay
 Were Jean Bourgeois and Hippolyte et la chere Amelie.

And there they stand with visage tanned and bearded to the eyes
 On tiptoe raised around to gaze on water, earth, and skies,
 When a voice was heard "Que cherche t'on—le ballon est crévé"—
 Parti dans cinq ou six pieces—enfin—all blown away."

" Ah ! maudite soit la poussiere, et maudit Mister Green, Soient maudits tous les vils Anglais, et Madame Celestine !
 Oh ! dam, nous avons perdu toute cette belle journée,
 Pour voir one horse and carriage, et la machine ruinée.

STANZAS.

Sometimes in summer hours are seen
 Light clouds by viewless currents driven
 To glance athwart the blue serene,
 And vanish in the sun-lit heaven ;
 Or at the tranquil close of day
 In starry twilight meteors play
 Sure heralds of the coming storm,
 Whose wakened wrath and wild career
 Smite nations with unwonted fear,
 And ravage Nature's form.

From Carmel thus a darkening hand
 Elijah saw above the main,
 Which o'er Samaria's thirsting land
 Wide-spreading poured a mighty rain,
 Ere her polluted king his door
 Regained in Jezreel, when before
 His fervid wheels the Prophet trod,
 And conscious Israel's streaming eyes
 Bewailing past idolatries
 Repentant turned to God.

Thus too in gayest hours will pass
 A sad and strange presentiment,
 And shadowed on the mental glass
 In turbid visions will be blent
 Imaginings of woe unknown
 With dreamy indistinctness shewn ;
 Which yet with bitterness alloy
 The wine cup mantling on the lips,
 And cast a damp and drear eclipse
 On scenes of light and joy.

Call it not vain—in you fair form
What treachery lurks, what falsehood speaks,
The lightnings of a distant storm
Flash in those eyes, and tinge those cheeks !
Around, what dire diseases wait
The secret ministers of fate,
While Death triumphant over all
In gloomy solitude enthroned
Spreads o'er the dim horizon round
His universal pall.

Be hushed rash moralist ! forbear
Thyself to sharpen passion's sting,
Nor blast with wintry presage drear
The raptures of the blooming spring !
Enough for thee unstained to go
Through realms of pleasure, pain, or woe,
Enough to fix thy wavering faith,
Resigning thee to Him on high
Who robbed the grave of victory
And took the sting from Death.

THE MORN OF PARTING.

SHEERNESS.

My sailor boy ? lie still and sleep
 Nor thus uneasy start,
 Enough for me to wake and weep
 The hour that bids us part.

The morning gun its heavy knell
 Hath rolled across the bay,
 Sad to these ears the neighbouring bell
 Proclaims the dawning day ;

Lie still and sleep, my sailor boy ?
 The time approaches nigh,
 When thou no longer shalt enjoy
 A bed's calm luxury.

The wave shall rock thy slumber soon,
 The cot thy cradle be,
 And shrilly piping winds attune
 The requiem of the sea.

Strange forms shall cross thy nightly rest,
 Strange sounds assail thine ear,
 And scare thee from thy pendent nest
 Albeit unused to fear.

And many a moon shall wax and wane,
 And many a tempest roar,
 Ere thou and I may meet again,
 On this thy native shore.

If God indeed permit that day
Of meeting to arrive,
And guide thee home a stripling gay
To find thy sire alive.

Ah ! who can tell what chance and change
Three long long years may bring,
Or who may dare thus far to range
On Hope's Icarian wing ?

The wasting pangs of fierce disease
The battle or the storm
May quench the mightiest energies
May blight the fairest form.

Full oft when wintry tempests drive
The scud athwart the sky,
And heaving ocean seems to strive
In restless agony.

When the moon hides her waning light,
And stars are lost to view,
And gathering rain-clouds veil the night
In robes of blackest hue ;

The hearts of oak that plough the sea
Shall then my thoughts employ,
And then I'll breathe a prayer for thee
My gallant sailor boy.

WOMAN'S LOVE.

I mark the shadow's dense of even Obscure the sinking sun,
 While slowly o'er the western heaven
 Night spreads her mantle dun.

Yet one unlooked for sunbeam darts
 Its light athwart the gloom,
 Like the last grace that death imparts
 To Beauty's faded bloom.

So Woman's smile the close can cheer
 Of Sorrow's darkened day
 So gild the clouds of doubt and fear
 With Hope's inspiring ray.

I climbed the mountain's top-most crag
 I trode the wasted heath,
 And felt my weary foot-steps flag
 The fiery sun beneath ;

One spot there was of liveliest green
 To glad the wanderer's heart,
 Where purest rills of diamond sheen
 From caverned sources start.

'Tis Life—that scathed and blighted ground
 Where man is doomed to rove,
 The Fount that scatters freshness round
 That Fount is Woman's love.

PARODY FROM WITCHES' MASQUE.

BY BEN JOHNSON.

MASQUE OF SPECIAL CONSTABLES.

April 10th, 1848.

1ST SPECIAL.

I have been all day looking a'ter
 A ruffian bawling for the Charter
 And soon as he stopped to quench his drowth
 I snatched the porter pot out of his mouth.

2ND SPECIAL.

And I have witnessed Fergus' fears,
 Macdowell's froth, and Jones's tears,
 The damning of Lord John Russell's eyes
 And all since the Chartists swore they'd rise.

3RD SPECIAL.

I last night lay all alone
 I'the streets to hear the tradesmen groan ;
 I plucked them up though their hearts were low
 And told them the meeting would be no go.

4TH SPECIAL.

I have been shivering cold and dull
 In a damp churchyard of Specials full
 With peers of the realm and doughty cits.
 Who bothered the sexton out of his wits.

5TH SPECIAL.

Under an entry I did creep
 And found a Policeman fast asleep—
 For a week he never had changed his clothes
 And he'd got a black eye and a bloody nose.

WITCHES' MASQUE.

---

1ST WITCH.

I have been all day looking after
A raven feeding on a quarter—
And soon as she turned her beak to the south
I snatched this morsel out of her mouth.

2ND WITCH.

I have been gathering wolves' hairs,
The mad dog's foam, and the adder's ears,
The spurning of a dead man's eyes
And all since the midnight star did rise.

3RD WITCH.

I last night lay all alone
On the ground to hear the mandrake groan—
I plucked him up though he lay full low
And as I had done the cock did crow.

4TH WITCH.

I ha' been choosing out this scull
From charnel houses that were full,
From private grots and publick pits,
And frightened a sexton out of his wits.

5TH WITCH.

Under a cradle I did creep
By day, and when the child was asleep
By night I sucked its breath, and rose
And plucked the nodding nurse by th' nose.

6TH SPECIAL.

I had a truncheon, what did I with that ?
Hit an itinerant over the hat—
Our squad was jolly with pipes, and ale,
And we voted that physical force must fail.

7TH SPECIAL.

A customer threatened to knock out my brains
So I gave him a tap with my staff for his pains—
His chin and his cheeks were covered with hair
And he looked like a French Revolutionnaire.

8TH SPECIAL.

A cold in my head, and a crick in my neck,
A cough in the chest, and a pain in the back
I have been getting when wet to the skin
For it rained cats and dogs, and I mightn't stay in.

9TH SPECIAL.

I have been down upon Kennington Green,
And, though they were there, not a soldier was seen,
But I saw a dead cat, and some cabbages thrown,
And twice I was like to be struck with a stone.

10TH (AN M.P.)

I from the jawing of Cobden and Hume
Did snatch these bones to the coffee room,
And never went near "the House" again
But paraded up and down in the rain.

6TH WITCH.

I had a dagger, what did I with that ?
Killed an infant to have its fat ;
A piper it got at a church ale,
I bade him again blow wind i' the tail.

7TH WITCH.

A murderer yonder hung in chains
The sun and the wind had shrunk his veins
I bit off a sinew, I clipped his hair,
I brought off these rags that danced in the air.

8TH WITCH.

The scritch owl's eggs, and feathers black,
The blood of the frog, and the bone in his back
I have been getting and made of his skin
A purset to keep Sir Cranion in.

9TH WITCH.

And I ha' been plucking plants among Hemlock, henbane, adder's tongue,
Night shade, moon-wort, libbard's bauc
And twice by the dogs was like to be ta'en.

10TH WITCH.

I from the jaws of a gardener's bitch
Did snatch these bones, and then leaped the ditch—
Yet went I back to the house again
Killed the black cat, and here is the brain.

11TH SPECIAL.

I went to be sworn in at Westminster Hall
With three of my sons, my nephews, and all.
We patrolled through the streets till a quarter-past four
In squads of a dozen, what would you have more.

ENTER SIR GEORGE GREY.

Yes; I have brought to aid your force
Battalions of infantry, troops of horse,
The Life-Guards are ready at bugle's call
And the Blues have their carabines loaded with ball.
A forest of bayonets bristles nigh
With a squadron of light artillery,
So Her Majesty thanks you for service done,
And bids you rely upon me, and Lord John.

They dance and sing "God save the Queen"

11TH WITCH,

I went to the toad breeds under the wall
I charmed him out, and he came at my call,
I scratched out the eyes of the owl before,
I tore the bat's wing—what would you have more.

ENTER HECATE.

Yes! I have brought to aid your vows
Horned poppy, Cypress boughs,
The fig tree wild that grows on tombs,
And juice that from the larch tree comes,
The basilisk's blood and the viper's skin,
And now our orgies let's begin.

THE RETURN.

The word has gone forth that he comes at last,
 The soldier from duty free,
 And many a wistful glance is cast
 Eastward o'er hill and lea,
 For seven long weary years are past
 Since he sailed o'er the wide lone sea.

And flags are unfurled on the mountain wind,
 And voices upraised in joy,
 And some eyes with thankful drops are blind,
 But the tears are without alloy,
 From those who remember the greetings kind
 They received from the fair-haired boy.

That fair-haired boy is all changed, I trow,
 And inured to the woes of war,
 And daring is stamped on his manly brow,
 And his shoulders are deep and square,
 And the smooth downy cheek is bearded now,
 And sunburnt the flaxen hair.

For he has sailed o'er the ocean wide
 And toiled with the toiling crew,
 Trød Africk's desert with fearless stride,
 And sped o'er the parched Karroo,
 And breasted the swollen Keiskamma's tide
 To the camps of the swart Zooloo.

Where the Bushman's sly malignant art
Blows venom with his breath,
And the naked Kaffir hurls his dart
Unseen in the mountain heath,
And the forest's caverned echos start
At the savage shout of death.

Where the lion crouches in his wrath
Dread monarch of the waste,
And the ostrich wheels o'er the sandy strath
With the gems-bok bounding past,
And pitfalls lurk in the treacherous path
Where each step may prove the last.

Here may the fell hyæna lurk
With eyes of phosphor glare,
And serpents hang from the knotted fork
Of branches all scathed and bare,
Or the vulture stoop to his carrion work
Through the death-tainted air.

And here he built him a hut of clay,
And called it by the name
Of the distant towers where his kinsfolk lay
Looking far over Tyne and Team,
For thither the exile's thoughts would stray
When in dreams their memories came.

And onward again o'er the trackless wave
Hath he sailed to the torrid shore
Where the rebel Sepoys yell and rave
And the murderous cannon roar,
And many a grave of our soldiers brave
Tells its tale of sufferings o'er.

These stormed the breach—these brought relief
To Delhi or Lucknow,
Captain and sergeant—clansman and chief
Distinctions forgotten now—
Their hour of triumph was bright and brief
As the death-shot that laid them low.

With them hath he fought, and pursued the foe
In his flight through the jungle dire,
When the noontide sun from his dazzling bow
Shot downward his shafts of fire,
And cholera poisoned the air below,
And lurked in the rice-field's mire.

All these hath he 'scaped, and returning from
The perils of Eastern fight,
He re-visits the hills which he loved to roam
In the days of his boyhood light,
And the cheerful hearths of his early home
With its fountains of water bright.

And he blesses the cool translucent stream,
And the sprightly mountain air,
And the northern sun's attempered beam
Instead of that Indian glare
Which but for the shield of a Power supreme
Had stricken its victim there.

Oh! Father of Mercies! e'en although Temptations may be rife,
And he transgress—forgive him Thou!
And in the battle strife
Avert the foeman's deadly blow
And guard his precious life.

THE POLISH EXILE.

(FROM THE GERMAN.)

To-day I wander forth alone,
 The brave the virtuous mourn for me—
 A traveller in lands unknown,
 Far from those friends no more my own,
 My Fatherland I think of thee.

On Wisla's banks of frozen sand
 Mantling falls the winter snow,
 But thus to leave thy much-loved strand
 And bid adieu to Fatherland,
 Fills this bursting heart with woe.

Fast and thick the bullets fly
 Over this devoted head;
 Where I fall there must I lie,
 Without a tear or elegy,
 Without a friend to mourn the dead.

Thou alone wilt o'er me weep,
 Thou perceive the fatal wound,
 O Fatherland, and where I sleep
 Thy tears for evermore shall steep
 The plot of consecrated ground.

Son ! that hear'st my parting word,
Prove worthy of thy father's vow !
Hear his prayer for thee outpoured,
Take his blessing, take his sword,
Be the world thy father now.

Though in vain her champions stood,
Poland's honour ne'er shall fall,
All the noble, all the good,
Will shed for her their willing blood,
Fired at sacred duty's call.

Still a more auspicious fate
Shall cheer Sarmatia's desert plains,
And brighter days her sons await,
In freedom's cause regenerate,
Spite of tyrants, spite of chains.

1839.

THE WIDOW'S LAMENT.

The battle is over on Palestine's plain,
 Why comes not my own gallant warrior again ?
 For each maiden hath welcomed her lover's return,
 I only in solitude tremble and mourn.

Hath his heart proved inconstant to love and to me,
 Hath his tongue broke his vows, hath his glance wantoned
 • free ?
 Have the fire-flashing eyes of the maids of Cashmere
 Like a basilisk smitten my young Cavalier ?

Ah ! would it were thus, for reflection at last
 To the conscience will whisper when passion is past,
 And he'd turn from a stranger's embrace to the worth
 That he prized in his true-hearted Maid of the North.

Ah ! would it were thus, for the wandering dove
 Will return on fleet wing to the nest of his love,
 But woe ! if the falcon hath borne him a prey
 All bleeding and torn to her eyrie away.

For I dreamed of my knight, where he lay in his gore
 Cold, naked and lifeless on Galilee's shore,
 And his last prayer was breathed, and his last thought was given
 To his love upon earth, to his Saviour in heaven.

And the vulture wheeled round on the death-tainted air,
And the wolf and hyæna came down from their lair,
And a wan ghastly light in the vision was shed,
By the moon rising pale o'er a field of the dead.

And cold was that heart which so often had beat
Responsive to mine when in rapture we met,
And dim were those eyes that once shone like a star,
And now melted in love, and now kindled in war.

Then hush thee ! my baby, for never again
Shall thy father arise from the bed of the slain :
Lie still my poor heart ! lest the wild sob of grief
Rend my bosom in twain, and bring death for relief.

BAMBOROUGH CASTLE.

Hail to thee sainted Bamborough ! from far
 Illumining the solitary coast
 Gleam thy revolving watch fires, when no star
 Beacons the vault of heaven and tempest-tost
 All hope of life the mariner hath lost;
 Till the known signal booming from thy steep
 Proclaims the sailor's guardian at his post,
 Scares the lone sea-mew from her wave-rocked sleep,
 And wakes the midnight echoes slumbering on the deep.

Faith, Hope, and Charity their holy seat
 Have chosen here—a Scripture Trinity :
 Faith with clasped hands, and supplication meet
 Kneels on the beach in fervent agony,
 But Hope th' enthusiast on the stormy sky
 Waves her glad torch, and rears her radiant form
 Propitious o'er the wreck, while Charity
 Receives into her soft embrace, and warm,
 The wretch unconscious, pale, and shivering from the storm.

FROM THE GERMAN.

I think of thee when the sunshine streameth,
Bright o'er the bounding sea,
And when on the rills the moonlight gleameth
I think of thee.

I see thee when o'er the sandy strath
Swift sweep the vernal breezes,
And when on his eerie midnight path
The wanderer freezes.

I hear thee when on the booming shore
The ocean waves are driven,
And when the dim woods shadow me o'er,
In silent even.

I am by thee and though never so far
Still, still I have thee near—
The sun sinks, and lo! the Vesper star—
Would thou wert here.

FROM CLAUDIAN (SENEX VERONENSIS.)

FELIX QUI PATRIIS NUNQUAM MIGRAVIT AB AGRIS.

Happy the man whose life serene
 Glides on his native farm away,
 Whom the same humble home hath seen
 A sportive child, a grandsire grey.

Propt on his staff he prints the ground
 On which his childhood loved to crawl,
 And counts each year's successive round
 Within the self-same cottage wall.

Him Fortune in her various change
 Hath ne'er allured with gorgeous dream,
 Nor hath he quaffed in regions strange
 The waters of a foreign stream ;

No merchant he to dread the seas,
 Nor soldier roused at bugle's clang,
 No lawyer keen to clutch the fees
 Earned in the forum's loud harangue.

In the world's knowledge yet untaught,
 Untainted by the city's leaven,
 To him with purer joy is fraught
 The aspect of his native heaven.

Not by the change of Consul, he Computes the lapse of month and year,
In spring he marks the blooming tree,
    Whose fruit matures in autumn sere.

O'er the same hill appears the sun,
    Behind the same his chariot lowers,
Thus e'er the rustic's day is done,
    By his own rule he counts the hours.

The lofty oaks whose shade he loves,
    Were acorns in his early day,
And his co-temporary grows
    With him who planted them decay.

Verona's city he believes
    Remote as India's torrid land,
And Lake Benacus he conceives
    More distant than the Caspian strand.

Three generations see him yet
    With ruddy cheek and eye of fire,
His limbs robust, his sinews knit,
    Untamed by age, a reverend Sire.

Inquisitive let others roam
    Beyond Iberia's western skies,
His blest tranquillity at home,
    Excels their fruitless enterprize.

THE SAVOYARD.

A lone and friendless Savoyard far from my native home
 With my mandolin and Marmozet about the town I roam
 And though my voice may raise the song, my bosom heaves
     the sigh,
 And though my lips may seem to smile, the tear-drop fills my eye.

I think on Savoy's sunny skies, on Savoy's sounding floods,
 On her lakes and icy mountains, on her vines and olive woods,
 Where first I strung my mandolin and sang with childish glee,
 Ah, woe betide that minstrel art, it brought but woe to me.

As late I sate me down upon the stranger's threshold stone
 A gentle voice above me said, "Rest, rest, poor wearied one"
 And a female form appeared with an Angel's face divine, Who gave me alms and strove to cheer my heart with bread and wine.

And as I drank, again she spoke in my own Italian tongue,
 And soft and sweet upon mine ear her gentle accents rung,
 By Mary and the Saints be that lovely stranger blest,
 When I am gone, when soon I go, to everlasting rest.

For bitter blows the winter wind, and chilly falls the sleet
As I falter with my mandolin along the icy street,
And my shivering little Marmozet within my bosom's fold,
Will creep for warmth, in vain, for ah ! my very heart is cold.

My heart is cold, but fast and high my burning temples throb,
Nor can my struggling bosom now repress the frequent sob,
Through my thin and feeble hands the languid veins I trace, While hot and bright the hectic flush lights up my fevered face.

And ever in my slumbers a voice you cannot hear,
My mother's voice addresses me, in whispers soft and clear,
And a vision of the sunny hills, and vineyards of Savoy,
Comes to bless the dreaming spirit of the lonely Minstrel Boy.

1830.

1813 AND 1841.

DUKE OF WELLINGTON AND MARSHAL SOULT.

"None of M. Guizot's colleagues displayed more spirit at the close of the debate than the old Marshal, and we scarcely know a more singular parallel in Parliamentary History than that which the respective positions of the two oldest and greatest soldiers in Europe present at this moment ; both occupying the foremost line of defensive tactics against a petulant opposition—both contending for the maintenance of amicable relations between the two countries, whose respective armies each has led, and might again lead to the field, and both devoting the unextinguishable energies of their brave and honourable lives to the preservation of peace throughout the world."—The Times, July 7th, 1841.

Two Warriors stood on the battle plain
Engaged in the mighty shock
That thrilled through the Gallic Tyrant's reign
From the broad Garonne to the winding Seine,
And burst the bonds of delivered Spain
On the Pyrenean rock.

The one retreated with Lion glare
Still keeping his foes at bay,
The other stooped down from his mountain lair,
With standard and oriflamme streaming fair,
Like the Eagle that sweeps through the realms of air
On her scattered and panting prey.

The thunders of War have ceased, and Time
Hath wrapt in his circling zone
The scenes of blood, and the deeds of crime
Which polluted each city, and soil, and clime
From the Pharaoh's tombs, and Nilotick slime
To the Scythian's icy throne.

Where are those Warriors now ? no more
Opposed in the battle's strife ?
Their voices are heard like that voice of yore
Which rebuked the storm on Gennesaret's shore,
And amidst the winds' and waters' roar
Preserved the Apostles' life.

These Heroes twain of the olden war
Now bid the destroyer cease—
Unyoke the steeds of his iron car,
And looking to regions beyond the jar
Of furious Faction, adore the star
Of universal Peace.

NOTE.—This subject was suggested to me by Samuel Rogers, Esq., and the verses were sent him on the following morning.

FROM THE GERMAN.

Men love to talk and scheme
Of happier days before them,
And chase the golden dream
Through shadows darkening o'er them ;
The world grows old and young again,
But man still hopes for better things in vain.

Hope lures the blythsome boy
And with her spell enchants him,
She fills his soul with joy
And like a spirit haunts him ;
And when the grave his brief course closes,
Upon its turf the flower of Hope reposes.

'Tis not a meteor bright
By Fancy vain engendered,
Nor "ignis fatuus" light
By wandering phantom tendered,
That which the inward voice hath spoken
Shall never to the trusting soul be broken.

THE FOX AND THE ROSE.

A FABLE.

A Rose, the sweetest of the grove,
 Inspired a youthful Fox with love.
 Each morning the enamour'd brute,
 At earliest dawn, commenced his suit,
 Nor left the spot, till dewy night
 Eclipsed the charmer from his sight.
 He grew quite thin upon his passion,
 Relinquishing almost the fashion
 That used to tempt him (cunning sinner)
 To snap up goslings for his dinner,
 To throttle fowls, and strangle turkeys,
 Such as his brethren's nightly work is.

“ Dear Rose,” he'd cry, “ delicious Rose !
 Take pity on a lover's woes !
 Such tenderness as mine would move
 A very stock or stone to love !
 See with what care my feather'd brush
 Sweeps every insect from your bush ;
 How cautiously I clear the ground
 Of envious weeds that clasp you round
 When crouching near your fragrant root
 I give to light each budding shoot—
 And all unnoticed. Rose ! 'tis hard
 To linger on without reward.
 Grant me permission once to sip
 The sweetness of your ruby lip ;
 I tremble when I ask the favour,
 But answer for my good behaviour.”

The Rose replied, with some emotion,
" Touch'd as I am by your devotion,
And flatter'd by your predilections,
I entertain still some objections ;
And, as you say I've won your heart,
I hope you'll take them in good part.
First, mind I don't intend to flout ye,
There's something horrid slang about ye ;
You're handsome, that I don't deny ;
But then you've such a roguish eye ;
I can forgive your pointed nose,
Since it began to smell a Rose,
Your whiskers and your frill are neat ;
Your tail superb,—with pretty feet ;
But, as you sit, you look so cunning !—
You're very graceful when you're running.
Besides, I must object outright
To wandering about at night.
Ah, Sir ! although you flatter me,
You are not what you ought to be ;
And when I think of what you do,
My blush acquires a deeper hue.
Abroad at night you must not stir ;
And, lastly, (you'll excuse me, Sir,)
Your smell is shocking, worse by far
Than brandy, snuff, or a cigar ;
You must compassionate our noses,
Or leave off courting dainty Roses."

The Fox then took to his confessions ;
And, owning all his past transgressions,
With much humility declared
Himself, in all respects, prepared
To effect a thorough reformation,
If he might hope for consolation ;
Till, finally, so much repentance
Induced a favourable sentence.

When Reynard found himself preferr'd,
He honourably kept his word ;
Perfumed himself till he was sweet,
Lived on his love, and left off meat ;
Would hardly touch the youngest rabbits ;
Abandon'd all improper habits ;
Walk'd out by day, by night kept quiet ;
And took to vegetable diet.

Merrily pass'd the summer by,
Autumnal winds blew keen and high,
And Reynard thought (ungrateful fellow !)
His lovely Rose turn'd rather yellow.
October nights were damp and cold—
She certainly look'd thin and old ;
Till every trace of beauty vanish'd,
By desolate November banish'd.

Our gentleman was rather bored,
And, while he much the change deplored,
Sought refuge from a tête-à-tête,
By sleeping long and roving late ;
Began to think it might be pleasant
To eat a turkey, or a pheasant ;
Which, when once tasted, Lord defend us !
His appetite grew quite tremendous :—
Chickens were delicate and tender,
And if he miss'd a goose or gander
By th' water side, 'twas devilish luck
When he could not surprise a duck.
So terrible his devastation,
The neighb'ring farmers cried—" Damnation !
If huntsmen won't destroy such vermin,
Ourselves their punishment determine."

So said, so done—they strew'd his path
With divers instruments of wrath ;
Lay wait with guns, and fill'd the gaps
With snares and pitfalls, gins and traps ;
Till, to a hen-roost having watched him,
They shut the entrance, and despatch'd him.

MORAL.

So, in St. James's, have I seen
A young and reckless libertine,
Abjure his former odious vices,
His foibles, follies, and caprices ;
And seem to borrow sudden sense
From Love's delightful influence.
He pays off many an ancient score,
No longer drives a stage and four,
Nor cares what horses fill the stalls
At Tilbury's or Tattersall's,
Nor makes his morning lounge the stable,
Nor frets all night o'er Crockford's table.
No more he puffs tobacco smoke,
Nor spreads with glee a vulgar joke ;
Nor reels down Bond Street home to bed,
With pocket picked, and broken head,
But acts in all things with propriety,
And takes to civilized society.
Cymon of yore, th' Athenian fool,
Such lessons learn'd in Cupid's school,
And read of arms and knightly prize
In bright Iphigenia's eyes.
But Love oft flies on Beauty's wings,
And female charms are transient things,
And still the husband should remember
That hurricanes in bleak November
May blast and wither all too soon
The lovely rose that pleased in June.

And oh ! if angry words shall sever
The hymeneal bond for ever,
And constant bickerings aggravate
The loss of love to deadly hate,—
What then remains on this lone earth,
But vain attempts at hollow mirth,
Recurrence to an idle stage
That cheer'd in youth, but shames in age ;
The cold delusive stage of Fashion,
That stimulant of jaded passion !
Thence both are unresisting hurl'd
Within the vortex of the world,
And yielding to its giddy suction,
Are swiftly hurried to destruction.

THE DOE AND THE DONKEY.

A FABLE.

Says the Doe to the Donkey "the use of those ears
 And those dull stupid eyes puzzles me—
 For the more we instruct you, the less it appears
 Are you able to hear, or to see.
 If you wear them for show, those preposterous ears,
 Prithee come to the first Barber's shop,
 And as soon as the boy can get ready his shears,
 Bid him give them a regular crop."

To the Doe says the Donkey "I am but an Ass,
 And perhaps rather slow at my learning,
 And as it's my taste to eat thistles for grass
 I may be at fault in discerning.
 But a fine ear for music I certainly have
 And so you my fair critic will say,
 If you wait till I chant a melodious stave
 And lift up my voice for a bray."

So he tuned up his pipes, but the Doe in dismay
 Vaulted over the back of a Cow,
 And smitten with terror ran bounding away
 As fast as her feet would allow :
 And when at a distance escaped from the noise,
 She said while she trembled with fear,
 "Heaven save me from friends with so dreadful a voice
 Who yet boast of a musical ear."

HORATIA.

How beautiful she was—how bright—her form
Cast in a mould exact of strength and grace—
Her step how light and buoyant—and her face
Beaming with youth and gladness—but a storm
Blighted that goodly promise, and the worm
That loves to feed in secret, and abase
The choicest blossoms from their pride of place
Did creep into her bosom, and deform
A Flower more beautiful, than ever decked
The gay parterre, and sweeter than e'er cast
Its fragrance over the Sabœan waste ;
And thence she 'gan to wither, and neglect
The scenes, and pleasing toil she loved of yore—
The garden and the river bank—no more
Her step is heard the woodland path along,
No more her merry laugh, no more her cheerful song.

May 14th, 1846.

HORATIA.

Now on her couch she lies the livelong day
Attenuate, pale, exhausted, and when night
Draws near, too often the red fever light
Flushes her skin translucent, and with ray
Unnatural scares th' approach of sleep away ;
And in its stead strange waking dreams affright
Those hectic vigils, till the morning bright
Dawn in her eastern chamber, and the lay
Of twittering birds without, the breeze's sigh
That softly murmurs the green leaves among,
And all the sounds of Nature's minstrelsy
Entice that slumber, which the wearied eye
And wearied brain can scarce refuse, so long
Denied to nightly supplication, now
Relieved awhile from Fever's inward glow
She thankfully reposes, till the sun
Through half the heaven his daily course hath run.

HORATIA.

A few short weeks are past, and in the grave
All that was mortal of that fair young Maid
To rest from earthly suffering is laid :
And though some natural yearnings we may have
For one so loved and cherished, though we crave
Again to see her as she was, arrayed
In strength and beauty, such vain thoughts are stayed
By reason and religion, and the aid
Of Him who taketh back the gifts He gave.
For peaceful was her end, assured in Faith,
And all inspired with Charity and Hope—
Before her parting spirit Heaven did ope
The gate eternal, and her parting breath
Spoke for our comfort sweetest words of love—
I go, she cried, I go to bliss above
No doubts disturb, no pain attends my death—
With joy I tread that dark but easy road,
My blessing rests with you, my soul ascends to God.

TO THE MEMORY OF GRACE DARLING.

Grace by the grace of God an angel now,
Northumbria's Darling, both in deed and name !
Hath then the stroke of fate at length laid low
The maiden pride of that heroic brow
Which not the tempest's wrath nor lightning's flame,
Nor roaring surge, nor Death's near glance could tame.
Thy mortal part now moulders in the grave,
But ever to the Throne of Mercy rise
In concert with the hoarse resounding wave
The prayers of solemn voices, and the sighs
From thousand hearts united by the ties
Of universal charity which plead
Thy recompense in Heaven for one blest deed,
Whose memory fills all space and mounts the skies
Like incense from a burning sacrifice.

ABDUL AZIZ.

"MORS SOLA FATETUR

QUANTULA SINT HOMINUM CORPUSCULA."

The fiat has gone forth—the mighty Lord
Of countless millions must perforce obey—
And he, before whose glance but yesterday
One heedless gesture, one unthinking word
Had doomed the throat to scymitar or cord
Of Prince, or Vizier, Hospodar, or Bey,
Now lies a bleeding lump of senseless clay ;
No longer flattered, dreaded, and adored,
But a cold naked carcase, all exposed
To gaze of Doctors, summoned to decide
What death an Oriental Sultan died !
Whether the common death of Kings deposed,
Whose part upon the stage of life is closed,
Or, by his own despairing hand, a Suicide.

CHISWICK GARDENS.

Four Monarchs on the throne these eyes have seen.
From the third George's grey and sightless face,
To a fair offspring of his royal race,
Grandsons and Daughters of our peerless Queen,
(Fifth generation on this changing scene),
Who stand like Cherubims about the place
Hallowed by wedded love and youthful grace,
And genial courtesies and princely mien.
Touched by such picture I could well exclaim,
Now let thy servant part in peace, O Lord !
While here no envious cloud can rest, nor blame
Mar the bright pageantry of such fair fame,
With chill and blighting breath, but vows outpoured
From hearts that throb with loyalty, record
What blessings to the land are promised and restored.

T O W A T E R .

"Ἀριστον μέν ὕδωρ.

Purest of elements, O Water, thee
The Muse of Pindar hath imagined best,
Whether in torrents from the mountain crest,
Fed by the clouds thou tumblest plenteously,
Or rolling onwards to thy parent sea,
By many a fertile vale in verdure drest,
Thou minglest sweet and salt in some smooth bay,
Where Amphitrite ploughs her watery way,
And Tritons with the Naiads sport and play.
Such were thy glories, crystal Element,
When this green earth was young; but now since trade
Hath overrun the land, we see thee pent
In pipe and noisome sewer, and conveyed
Through stagnant reservoir or cistern, blent
With drugs and dyes most foul and pestilent,
Black, yellow, green, half sulphur, soot or lead,
Poisoning the ambient air, thyself a poison made.

POMFRET CASTLE.

Pomfret ! thy ruined towers and wasted halls,
Heaped on their mouldering rampart, still look down
On all the adjacent plain and subject town,
As from a kingly seat ; thy blood-stained walls—
All shattered by the avenger's cannon-balls—
With weed and liquorice plant are now o'ergrown.—
Not undeserved thy doom : each crumbling stone
Tells its own hideous tale ; yon vault which falls
Piecemeal, once rang with accents of despair
From lips of Rivers, Grey, and Lancaster ;—
And here th' assassin lurked, when doleful cries,
Startling the echos of that murky air,
Proclaimed what dire and poignant agonies
A captive King endured when slaughtered there—
Whose crown and realm became his Royal Murderer's prize.

Dec., 1864.

ON HER MAJESTY'S PRESERVATION FROM THE PISTOL OF A VILE ASSASSIN.

A King in courage, though by sex a Queen
Our lion-hearted Monarch in her state
And royal bearing calm, might well await
With cheek unblenched and with unaltered mien,
In faith assured and confidence serene,
Th' assassin's meditated stroke of late
Conceived in malice, cruelty, and hate ;
Feeling through all her innocent life, between The cradle and the Throne, that God's high Power Around the brave, the righteous, and the just,
His broad protection throws from hour to hour—
Chief may the Lord's Anointed found her trust
On that strong Rock, and adamantine Tower,
When adverse Fortune frowns and tempests lower,
And even Kings may own they are but dust.

June, 1842.

TO HER GRACE THE DUCHESS OF NORTHUMBER-LAND IN THE FLY-LEAF OF HER ALBUM.

Star of the North ! where'er thy gracious beam
Doth light, on mountain hoar, or feudal tower,
Or cottage hearth, or Stanwick's modest bower,
Or Keildar's shadowy strath of mist and gleam,
From its pure firmament it still doth seem
A mild benignant influence to shower,
Making the hall more gay, more sweet the flower,
More glad the cottage, and more bright the stream.

Shine on fair star ! beside thy crescent moon !
Still light the weary traveller on his way,
That seeing thee, his thoughts may flow in tune
With all things good and gentle, while thy ray
Serenely clear, doth change his night to noon,
Making that night less lonely than the day.

February, 1851

ON THE DISTANT VIEW OF CHEVIOT IN HIS WINTRY GARB.

The ground on which I stand is dirt and mire
All foul and drenched with rain, but towering high
In the far radiance of the western sky
The snowy dome of Cheviot tipt with fire
Glow's like the Seraph's gate in Eden, higher
To mortal seeming, than th' ambitious eye
Can dare to measure, or man's footstep try,
Though to the stars his yearning may aspire.
So from the conflict of life's weary war
With sin and sorrow, may the eye of Faith
Discern the mansions of the Blest afar,
Which shed a lustre like the Planet Star,
That warned the Shepherds upon Bethlehem's heath,
What hour the Babe divine first drew his natal breath.

I.

UPON MY DAUGHTER FLORENTIA'S DANGEROUS SICKNESS AND PROVIDENTIAL RECOVERY.

As some fair flower new-risen from the ground
Expands his petals to the Solar beam
And that which late a withered root did seem
Now sheds a lively grace and sweetness round,
So from that couch where dire disease had drowned
All sense and intellect, the Hand Supreme Hath reared a living Angel from the dream
Of Death, which over her so long had frowned.
Adore Him, then, fair Angel! let the blaze
Of holy incense on His altar shine!
Pour forth the song of gratitude and praise
For wondrous mercy dealt to thee and thine,
Since unto Him it seemeth good to raise
The living from the dead by Grace Divine.

ON THE SAME.

Full thirty days and nights my darling lay
Bereft of speech and sense, while ebbing life
Still hardly could maintain a dubious strife
With the fierce foe that seized her for his prey—
Yet now she wakens to the light of day,
And after such long trance begins to smile,
Recurr to things forgotten for a while,
And frames her mouth to speak, her thoughts to pray.
While such a light illumines her radiant eyes
And plays upon her cheeks, and marble brow,
As if the Angels in her agonies
Had rapt her from this being vile and low
To commune with blest spirits in the skies,
Then brought her back to earth more pure than virgin snow

ON THE SAME.

My Child hath surely had a glimpse of Heaven
A more than mortal lustre gilds her face,
And in each word and action you may trace
A tenderness untainted by earth's leaven
Such as may well belong to souls forgiven,
That walk in glory Eternal by the grace
Of Him who died for Adam's guilty race,
And offers us a like reward, when shriven
From all our mortal frailties—such a ray
Flashed from the brow of Moses, when he came Forth from the visible Presence, on his way
From Horeb with the Tables, to proclaim
The Laws he bore to Israel's array,
Graved on the stone in characters of flame.

December 14th.

IV.

ON THE SAME.

Still to my mind recurs that awful night
When the vexed spirit of the tempest rolled
The war of elements o'er crag and wold
Shaking the forest, and the Northern Light
Shot from the Polar realm its streamers bright ;
There lay my darling, pale, unconscious, cold,
As corpse about to mix with kindred mould.
And that grim King who mocks at mortal might Shook o'er her prostrate form his fatal dart,
Shook but delayed to strike—the Saviour mild
Triumphant over death, when human art
Availed not, to our prayers benignant smiled,
Poured balm into a parent's bleeding heart,
Stretched forth his hand, and saved our suffering child.

ON THE SAME.

Omens of evil, sentences of gloom
Met me abroad, and when I turned the leaf
Of Holy Volume to assuage my grief—
All spoke of Death—and Death indeed hath come
*And borne away one victim to the tomb—
But one the tyrant spared—yea even He Inexorable Death, was moved to see
So fair a blossom in her early bloom
Nipt by the winter frost before her prime—
His shadow fell athwart her, but the flower
Though sorely crushed and blighted for a time
Again shall flourish in the vernal hour
Transplanted to a warm and genial clime,
And charm th' admirer's gaze, and deck th' Idalian bower.

AN ALLEGORY.

I had a dream, which was not all a dream ;
Methought a gorgeous fabric from the earth
Rose like an exhalation, at whose birth
The dark and lurid atmosphere did seem
All charged with nitrous cloud, and a red stream
Like blood from the foundation stone welled forth,
While peals of thunder drowned all thought of mirth,
With clang of trumpets mingled, and the scream
Of voices raised in triumph or in woe.
Sudden all vanished, and a blackened scroll
Wav'd o'er a heap of ruins—tow'rs laid low
'Mid broken columns and beams charred to coal,
On which was writ in characters of flame,
“ Here late the temple stood of Military Fame.”

Sept. 6th, 1870.

ON A PASSING VIEW OF KIELDAR CASTLE.

Kieldar ! thy towers half hid in sombre wood
O'ertopped by banks of fern and purple heath,
Thy brawling brooks that in the glen beneath
Mingle with infant Tyne their mossy flood,
Awaken thoughts in me scarce understood
By the gay bustling crowds who draw their breath
In the thronged town—alas ! ye speak of death.
For here the shade of Algernon the Good,
Lord of this lonely wilderness, still seems
To linger, as in happier days of yore,
About these bosky dells and winding streams,
And gladden with his aspect all the moor
Late sparkling in the sunshine's golden gleams,
Now veiled in mist, and bathed with sympathetic shower.

CHARADES.

CHARADES.

---

I.

My First is the foe of the human race,
Since the day that our parents fell
From their innocent state and their holy place,
Seduced by the wiles of Hell.
And it still forms the part of each wayward heart
That consigns the soul to death,
And entangles the path of each child of wrath,
And renounces the Saviour's faith.

My Next was a city of ancient might,
Whose monarch and people died
When Joshua smote the Amorite,
And trampled on Canaan's pride :
But not till Israel's camp had first
Been purged of the traitor's blood,
Whose coveted spoil and whose deed accurst
Had kindled the wrath of God.

My Whole is that place where the Lord of heaven
By the children of Judah was heard
Amid thunders, and earthquakes, and flashing levin,
To proclaim His awful word.
That word which would banish my first from the earth,
But that erring mortals still
Are swayed by the Fiend who gave it birth,
To oppose th' Almighty's will.

II.

Toll ye the solemn knell
The sacred minstrels call :
And chant my First for the brave who fell
In fight with the turbaned Infidel
Beneath my Second's wall.

In mingled heaps they lie,
The Christian and the Turk :
And loud and long the battle cry
Of rage and anguish rent the sky,
For n-y Whole was the word ere victory
Completed her bloody work.

III.

My First hath trodden the Lapland shore
And ridden the viewless blast
Hath conversed with the page of forbidden lore
And swept through the storm on the wild wave's roar,
And shadowed the moon's pale planet o'er
With the spells about her cast.

The scope of my Second describe who can
For perchance it exceeds thine own—
Nay it baffles what even itself began,
And it sharpens the wits of the artisan,
And devises the subtle statesman's plan,
And sits by the kingly throne.

No token of grace no saintly prayer
Can avail for the guilt of my Whole :
But the flambeau's flame and the faggot's glare,
On their dull red wreaths of smoke shall bear
To the Fiend who sits in the dusky air
His shrieking victim's soul.

IV.

Go to my First young Hero go !
Nor pause in thy bold career—
For a charmed life in the battle strife
Thou bearest and still shalt bear.
Though the blood of the slain shall empurple the plain
And thousands beside thee fall,
The steel and the shot shall injure thee not,
Nor the thundering cannon ball.

Go forth the arbiter of Fate !
But still on thy dauntless breast,
My Next thou must wear as a talisman there
From the woman who loves thee best—
For misfortune shall frown on thy kingdom and crown,
And a gloom overshadow the hour,
When her bond shall be broke by the glittering yoke
Of a Royal paramour.

So spake my Whole as his gifted eye
Glanced over the horoscope,
Whereon was written the destiny
Of Gallia's scourge and hope ;
And oft when his star had set in the main
And his eagle had soiled her plume,
Napoleon mused on the mystic strain
That foreshadowed his future doom.

V.

Blow swiftly, blow swiftly thou fresh'ning breeze
Flow onward thou shining river,
And ever my First shall keep pace with these
To their greetings responsive ever.

And softly my Next from the starry skies
Sink down to the teeming earth,
On the wings of the morning again thou'lt rise
To the regions that gave thee birth ;

But far be my Whole from the land that I love
And far from my lady's bower,
For there's blight in the breath of the blasts above,
And it withers the bloom of the vernal grove
And poisons each opening flower.

VI.

My First hath many a fortune made,
And ruined many more,
So if you'd prosper in your trade
You'll drive it from your door.

He who the pangs of love may feel
Perchance by Cupid beckoned
Low at your feet may humbly kneel,
And after many a mute appeal
May fondly plead my Second.

My Whole but few desire to have,
And fewer still to lose ;
Be rid on't while you may, and save
Your fortune from the Jews.

VII.

In public houses of low resort,
In the Courts of Law, and the Inns of Court,
In the Common's House, and the House of Peers
The name of my First will oft meet your ears,
And should you be brought there in gyve or in fetter
The sooner you quit it uninjured the better:

The love of my Next is a passion that drives
The bulk of mankind through the whole of their lives,
To herd with the Jews, and the Bulls and the Bears
Upon 'Change and the Market for Railway Shares,
And though in itself 'tis a good not an evil
If unchecked it will hurry them all to the Devil.

But whether my Whole may be bad or good
Depends on its worth being well understood ;
Unknown in extent and in form undefined
If you get it I hope it may prove to your mind,
For it palls with possession and sometimes it turns
Like a rose bush in winter to nothing but thorns.

VIII.

My First in his youth was a Warrior Knight
Steady of heart and hand,
The leader of many a stubborn fight,
When he scattered the Paynim host in flight
And dyed with their blood the sand.

But now my Second hath conquered him
And furrowed his hoary brow,
And palsied the nerve of each stalwart limb,
And veiled the lids of his eyeballs dim
That had quailed to no other foe.

So the sackcloth shirt and the couch of stone
In my Whole are his refuge now
Where meekly in slumber he lays him down,
And looks to the hope of a heavenly crown
When released from this world below.

IX.

My First is one of twins who ne'er are parted
Save when cut off by some untimely fate,
Yet deem not the survivor broken-hearted
He soon provides himself another mate,
Not quite so faithful, active, strong and ready,
But uncomplaining, durable, and steady.

My Next which comes to all, is seldom thought on Although each day presents us with its warning,
And oh ! too oft is prematurely brought on
By those who madly waste life's precious morning,
To me Gods, men, and columns witness bear,
And e'en this globe itself the general doom must share.

My Whole recalls the shadow of times past,
And beckons from the dark oblivious grave
Forms which the change of empires shall outlast,
Words of the wise and actions of the brave :
Else the Mæonian Bard had sung in vain,
And vain were Shakspear's lore and Scott's romantic strain

X.

My First's an ugly awkward thing of wood
Which up and down its heavy arm doth sway,
And like a feeble speaker of our day
Doth spout, and spout and spout away
In one weak washy everlasting flood.

My Second's each relation you possess,
And I for my part have them by the dozens
Brothers and sisters, nephews, nieces, cousins,
To praise or censure, punish or caress.

My Whole is fair to look at, but to eat
More nauseous than the fruit of that curst land
Whose core is dust and ashes; in the sand
It lies reposing in the noontide heat,
With tattered foliage and with feeble stalk
Like a fat lazy pig too weak to rise and walk.

XI.

My First's a plural noun and means
A lot of boys beyond their teens,
The full grown denizens of earth,
With more or less of wit and mirth,
And varying too in form and feature
Distinct on each respective creature.

My Next's a simple integer
Which different values yet may bear—
Sometimes it dances on the green
Superior both to King and Queen
And sometimes fallen from honours' use
You send it packing to the dence.

My Whole's a goad to vulgar hinds
But when addressed to generous minds,
It shocks the taste like poisoned meat,
Turning to bitter all that's sweet,
Recciling like a restive hack
Upon a thoughtless rider's back.

XII.

My First's the mistake of your blundering feet
When you run without seeing your way down the street,
My Next's the mistake of your blundering hand
When you knock down the basin or jug from its stand—
My Whole's the mistake of your blundering brains
When you talk like a fool, and are chid for your pains.

XIII.

Within my First's embattled mound
That proudly rises o'er the sea
I wistful gaze on all around
The sky, the sand, and steep glacis,
To think of thee, my own true love,
To think of thee.

And when my Second's darkening cloud
Brings peace and rest to all but me,
And wraps beneath her dewy shroud
The cattle slumbering on the lea
I dream of thee, my own true love
I dream of thee.

But grief will cease as time rolls on,
And future hours may brighter be,
For when my Whole is passed and gone
Thy face adored again I'll see,
And fly to thee, my own true love
And fly to thee.

XIV.

Bleeding and faint Medoro lay
At the battle's close on the dusty way.
The peerless maid of Gallafrone
Fast on her Arab courser flying
Amid the wounded and the dying

Turned piteous at the stripling's moan ;
She staunch'd his wounds, and bore him far
Beyond the tumult of the war,
Till in a grot the swain she laid
Deep in the twilight forest's shade—

And there she proffer'd my First and there

From my Second the bubbling wave she brought,
And washed the gore from his clotted hair,

And cooled the fever-parch'd throat--
How shall they speak my Whole ? oh never May that sad word affections sever
When glowing memory still survives
The passage of a thousand lives.

XV.

"Oh ! where hast thou been Lord Ronald my son ?
What aileth thee Ronald ? my handsome young man ?"
"Oh mother, dear mother ? now make my bed soon—
For I'm weary with hunting, and fain would lie down."

Her stand hath she ta'en at the couch of her son
And the struggle of death in his slumber came on—
And despair choked her voice and tears blinded her eye
To see in that struggle her loved one die.

She ran my First through the sheets and made
A shroud of the clothes where her boy was laid,
And my Second she clipped from his pale pale face,
Still wet with the tears of her last embrace.

And the fatal hour and the cause she curst
When he left the home where his childhood was nurst
For a leman's false hand had prepared the bowl
Which Lord Ronald had drunk, and had died by my Whole.

XVI.

My Second's slender make employs
The skill of mortals twenty,
Though for one sixpence Betty buys
Innumerable plenty.

The hand of Nature made my First
And in my Whole she placed it,
Which if you saw when parched with thirst,
Oh ! how you'd long to taste it.

So longed our Parent Eve of yore
When lured by the Deceiver
She plucked the fruit in evil hour
And cursed her race for ever.

XVII.

Come gentles all—both great and small
If in the sun you swelter,
You'll find good cheer, bread, meat, and beer
Within my Second's shelter.

This is the way to keep holiday,
But as you slake your thirst
I charge you think, amid your drink
'Tis fit you pay my First.

Policemen wait beside the gate
Refuse—and on my soul
A single word may soon be heard—
They'll take you to my Whole.

XVIII.

In the halls of fair Eton my boyhood was trained,
 But modesty dwells not on honours obtained ;
 Enough that I mixed in the conflict of mind
 With scholars and poets and lagged not behind :
 There my First was my idol—at books or at play—
 My dream of the night, and my hope in the day.
 Too buoyant at times my ambition might be,
 But when gratified—oh ! what a treasure to me !
 Soon removed to the camp amidst cannon and shot,
 The delight of my boyhood I scorned or forgot—
 Yet in secret I sighed, for like others I reckoned
 That promotion was sure were I found on my Second.
 Now my sabre is sheathed, I'm reduced to half-pay,
 My First a bright vision has melted away.
 But as for my Second ere leaving the stage
 I could welcome it still as the toy of my age.
 Now a word of confession—I am but a shy one !
 Though once I am sure I was brave as a lion,
 Alas ! for my nerves—my heart goes pit-a-pat
 And I run from my Whole like a mouse from a cat.

NOTE.—Although this admirable Charade is the composition of another, a greatly beloved and respected Friend, I venture to add it to the list of the preceding, for fear it might be lost to such as may derive amusement from such ingenious trifles.

RIDDLE.

To the palace and cottage the entry is mine
I'm enjoyed by the peer, and am thrown to the swine,
I lie snug in a bed, and in ships I find room
To some I am poison to others perfume,
Some view me with appetite, others with fears
I move some to disgust, quicken others to tears—
Sometimes I am naked, but often am drest,
While those who abuse me oft love me the best ;
You may loathe me at breakfast I shall not complain,
When I come in to dinner, you'll love me again :
Yet so dangerous am I that the girl of your heart
When you've been in my company bids you depart.
I've more coats than a dandy's whole wardrobe comprises,
And all of one suit, but of different sizes ;
My head and my tail are exactly the same
And my eye is between them, now tell me my name.
